If this bill is enacted into law and our method of payment is finally adopted by Congress, the following will result:

First. It will save the Government more than a billion dollars, or $112,000,000 a year for 12 years.

Second. It will save the Government more than $10,-000,000 in administration expenses of the Adjusted Compensation Act between now and 1945.

Third. It will pay a debt heretofore confessed by the Government to the veterans for services rendered.

Fourth. It will in effect be granting to the veterans the right to deposit a Government obligation and receive in return therefor new currency, the same right that is now enjoyed by Federal Reserve banks.

Fifth. It will prevent the veterans from losing a valuable equity by releasing them from the payment of compound interest on their loans. Veterans who have borrowed 50 percent under the present law, if the law remains as it is, will have very little remaining in 1945. It is not right for the Government and the banks to consume these valuable equities by requiring the veterans to pay compound interest on their own money.

Sixth. It will require no bond issue, no increase in taxes, no additional interest payment by the Government. The debt must be paid sometime. Everybody will be helped if it is paid now.

Seventh. It will partly restore to Congress its constitutional duty to issue money and deprive a few privileged bankers of a monopoly on the Government's credit.

Purchasing power must be placed in the hands of the masses. In this way it can be distributed quickly without the possibility of graft or favoritism. It is the best plan that has been proposed to be used as a vehicle to convey additional money into the hands of those who will buy goods. Underconsumption is our problem, and there is no better way to distribute purchasing power.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS WHICH I HAVE PREPARED ON THE PAYMENT OF THE ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

First. Q. What is an adjusted-service certificate?—A. It is a Government obligation payable to an honorably discharged veteran of the World War, who served longer than 110 days, payable in 1945, or 20 years from date of issuance, in return for services rendered.

Such a certificate is often referred to as a "bonus certificate." It is not a bonus certificate and should not be referred to as a "bonus." The term "soldiers' bonus" is a misnomer. It was coined by the enemies of the law in order that our cause might be condemned every time it is used. It is a soldier debt and should not be referred to as a "bonus."

Second. Q. Why did the veterans who served less than 110 days not receive such a certificate?—A. When each veteran was discharged he received $60 cash bonus to purchase civilian clothing, shoes, etc. The veteran had given his civilian outfit to the Red Cross when he entered the service. All veterans entitled to receive $50 or less were paid in cash and not given a certificate. In arriving at the amount of an adjusted-service certificate, the first 60 days were deducted on account of the $60 payment.

Third. Q. How did the Government arrive at the amount of an adjusted-service certificate?—A. Each veteran was allowed $1 a day extra for each day he served in the United States, and $1.25 a day extra for each day he served overseas with a limitation of $500 for home service and $625 for service overseas. John Doe, a veteran, was entitled to a credit of $460; $210 for 210 days home service and $250 for 200 days service overseas. The first $60 was deducted, reducing his credit to $400. Since he was being given a certificate due in the future, 20 years from date, the Government increased the amount of his credit by 25 percent for waiting, making the credit $500. He was then given a certificate for an amount equal to the $500 credit with 4-percent interest, compounded annually, for the 20 years, which amounted to $1,000. His certificate was dated January 1, 1925, and made payable January 1, 1945, or at death. This illustration represents the average veteran's adjusted-service certificate.

Fourth. Q. Why did Congress agree to give the veterans this extra amount?—A. When the Selective Service Act and other various legislative proposals were pending in Congress, relating to induction and enlistment of soldiers, sailors, and marines, the question of pay was very much debated. It was understood then that the pay agreed upon by Congress could be adjusted after the emergency in the event an adjustment was due. Many Members of Congress insisted on a $3 a day minimum pay. The war cost the United States more than $36,000,000,000; all the man power in uniform received less than $4,500,000,000 of this amount, or less than one-eighth of the cost of the war.

Fifth. Q. Did others receive adjusted pay from the Government for their services after the war?—A. Seven thousand war contractors received adjusted pay amounting to billions, directly and indirectly, after the war was over; many of them had invalid and illegal contracts which were validated by Congress. They were paid in cash. The railroad owners received a guaranteed return during the war equal to the average return 3 years prior to America's entrance into the war, which was the most prosperous period of railroading in the United States; in addition, they were given $3,000,000 a day extra pay for the next 6 months after being released from Government operation. Their adjustments in pay amounted to between one and two billion dollars; they were paid in cash. There were about 500,000 Federal civilian employees during the war; all of them receiving $2,500 a year or less had their pay adjusted, and the average received $1,000 extra pay. It was paid in cash. Many soldiers worked on the public roads in America during the war, side by side with civilians who were receiving $8 a day; these soldiers received an adjustment of $7 a day representing the difference between their soldier pay of $1 a day and the $8 a day drawn by the civilians. They were paid in cash after the war. Foreign countries, our allies during the war, were loaned billions of dollars by our Government after the war was over. They used a part of this money to pay their own veterans adjusted compensation and bonuses aggregating as high in some instances, as $7,290 each.

Sixth. Q. Are the veterans asking for the payment of a debt that is not due until 1945?—A. The debt is really past due now, although payable in 1945. The adjusted-service certificates gives the veteran the $1 a day for home service and the $1.25 a day for service overseas as of January 1, 1925, thereby depriving the holder of approximately 7 years' interest. If one is entitled to a certain amount daily or monthly over a period of time, the interest should be computed by allowing full interest from a date representing a time halfway between the beginning and ending of the period, about June 5, 1918.

Seventh. Q. If the veterans are allowed interest from the time the services were rendered instead of from 1925, will they be receiving special favors from the Government?—A. No; it has always been the policy of the Government to deal with others in that manner. For instance, when the war was over, applications for tax refunds were filed by individuals and corporations, many of them claiming that they had paid too much income taxes during the war and others claiming that they failed to deduct a sufficient amount for depreciation of their facilities used in war services. These claims were made, although they had made and sworn to the income-tax returns themselves. The Secretary of the Treasury refunded to large income-tax payers more than three thousand million, or $3,000,000,000, from the year 1922 to the year 1929, inclusive; an amount more than sufficient to pay the remainder of the adjusted-service certificates in full. Much of this money was refunded or given back to them on the theory that the taxpayers did not charge off a sufficient amount for depreciation in value of their properties during the war from 1917 to 1919. A large part of it was refunded in plain violation of the law. A large number of the beneficiaries of these large gifts were war profiteers and should have been convicted of treason for dissipating and plundering our resources during the war. When each refund was paid, the Treasury also paid the one receiving it 6-percent interest from the year it was claimed the deduction should have been made. On one refund to the United States Steel Corporation of $15,736,595.72, interest amounting to more than $10,099,765 was paid. Mr. Andrew Mellon, while Secretary of the Treasury, made large refunds to himself and to his companies, and in each case allowed 6-percent interest from the year he claims the credits should have been given, and not from 1925, the date of the adjusted-service certificates, or 7 years later. Those who are so loud in their denunciation of the proposal to pay the veterans this honest debt have been just as silent as the tomb while these war profiteers were wrongfully getting billions of dollars from the Treasury.

One receiving a tax refund in 1925 for an alleged overpayment in 1918 was paid 6-percent interest from 1918 on the amount of the payment. There is no reason why the veterans should not be paid from the time they rendered their services until 1925, the date of the certificates.

Eighth. Q. Why do you say that the certificates are past due?—A. If a holder of an adjusted-service certificate is paid the extra pay Congress has acknowledged and confessed was due him with 6-percent interest, compounded annually, from the time the services were rendered, he was entitled to an amount equal to the face or maturity value of his certificate October 1, 1931.

In other words, if a veteran is given his adjusted-service credit as of the time he rendered the service, without deduction of the $60 and without adding the 25-percent increase, he was entitled to an amount equal to the full face value of his certificate on October 1, 1931. If you allow him the 25-percent increase or a portion of it for the number of years elapsed since 1925, the full face value of his certificate was due long before October 1, 1931.

Ninth. Q. Is the interest rate suggested too high?—A. No. The veterans for many years were required to pay the Government 6-, 7-, and 8-percent interest, compounded annually, for their own money, when they borrowed on their certificates. The amount charged on these high interest rates is now a part of the loans, and compound interest is being paid on the amount annually. If it was fair for the veterans to pay 6-, 7-, and 8-percent interest compounded annually for their own money, and then receive it in small dribs, certainly it is not unfair for the Government to pay the veterans this 6-percent rate.

Tenth. Q. You have stated that $60 was deducted from each veterans' adjusted-service claim before arriving at the amount of his certificate; why was this $60 deducted?—A. In February 1919 Congress passed a law giving each ex-service man $60 additional pay upon discharge, considered to be an amount sufficient to purchase a civilian suit of clothes, the soldier having given his civilian clothing to the Red Cross when he entered the service, and it was sent to foreign countries to relieve distress there. The $60 was authorized to be given to all officers, including the major general, who received $8,000 a year with additional allowances, as well as the private who had served only 1 day in the military service. When the adjusted-compensation law was passed, the veterans receiving the certificates were required to account for the $60; in other words, to pay it back. The officer who drew $8,000 a year was permitted to keep his $60 and make no return to the Government, although such officer, or any other officer above the grade of captain, did not receive an adjusted-service certificate, Congress feeling that such officers were not entitled to have their pay adjusted. Neither was the private who served 3 days required to pay his $60 back to the Government. So why should the Government play the role of Indian giver to the holders of adjusted-service certificates? The $60 should not have been deducted. A compromise entered into by uninformed persons with the wise, greedy Secretary of the Treasury caused this chiseling amendment to be accepted.

Eleventh. Q. What did the veterans receive for their services during the war?—A. An enlisted man, private, received $1 a day, except the overseas service, when he received 10 percent extra, or $1.10 a day. They were permitted and in many cases required to make allotments of a certain amount of their pay monthly to their dependents; the amounts varied from $5 to $25 a month and were deducted from the amount due them. They also paid for altering and mending their clothing and shoes, barber bills, laundry bills, and other incidental expenses. In addition, the average veteran had deducted from his pay $6.60 a month for insurance; if he had anything remaining after these deductions were made, he was usually required to subscribe for a Liberty bond on the installment plan or be called a slacker disguised in American uniform.

Twelfth. Q. How many of these certificates are there outstanding; what is their average value, and so forth?—A. December 1934, there were 3,531,800 adjusted-service certificates in force, of the face or maturity value of $3,485,650,000; 3,037,500 of these certificates have been pledged to the Government and to the banks for loans aggregating $1,465,500,000, not including interest after October 1, 1931. These certificates range in value from $126 to $1,590 each, and their average value is approximately $1,000, to be exact, $959.88.

Thirteenth. Q. Why were the veterans not paid in cash in 1924 when the debt was confessed by Congress?—A. Mr. Andrew Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, convinced Congress that there was going to be a deficit of more than $600,000,000 at the end of that fiscal year. Congress, therefore, did not feel that the payment could be made. However, after the "tombstone" certificates had been issued and the fiscal year expired, there was a surplus in the Treasury of more than $300,000,000. It was Mellon's billion-dollar error that caused the issuance of the I O U's payable in 1945.

Fourteenth. Q. Have the veterans obtained loans on their certificates?—A. Yes; the average veteran has obtained a loan amounting to 50 percent of the face value of his adjusted-service certificate under the law of 1931. Most of the veterans, however, had borrowed on their certificates before the 50-percent loan act was passed. In fact, the average veteran holding a thousand-dollar certificate obtained a loan of $87.99 in 1927, $26.79 in 1928, $26.33 in 1929, $24.59 in 1930, and $23.50 in 1931, before the passage of the 50-percent loan act. When the 50-percent loan act was passed he borrowed $271.99 additional, which included the amount he had borrowed with interest to date. The veterans have borrowed the accumulated interest on the amount due them, the principal remains intact if their debts are adjusted in the same way that the Government adjusted the debts of others on contracts growing out of the World War. A veteran who has borrowed the limit on his certificate if the contract is not revised to do equity will obtain the following additional sums the dates indicated, and the remainder will be consumed or eaten up by the payment of interest: January 1, 1942, $30.04; January 1, 1943, $38.25; January 1, 1944, $39.79; and on January 1, 1945, he will be given $68.50, and the debt will be liquidated, nothing before 1942.

Fifteenth. Q. Would it not be better for the veterans to keep their certificates as a nest egg to be used in 1945 as suggested by Mr. Andrew Mellon?—A. If the remainder is not paid now, practically all of the remainder due will be consumed by compound interest required to be paid on prior loans. The veterans will be benefited more by substantial payments than they will be by receiving their money in dribs; it will benefit the country more.

Sixteenth. Q. If the veterans are not paid now, how much will be received in future by those who have borrowed the limit allowed by law, and will continue to borrow the limit on their certificates?—A. The following statement will answer for the average veteran holding a certificate of the average value:

Tabulation shows average adjusted-service credit, average amount of certificate, and amounts of principal and interest on loans, and amounts of cash to veterans as loans and at maturity. Assuming loans by a bank in the eleventh (Texas) Federal Reserve district at the maximum interest rate chargeable from 1927 to 1931, inclusive, then a loan on March 1, 1931, for the 50-percent loan value and redemption of the note by the Government in 6 months.

Seventeenth. Q. How much money will be required to pay the remainder due?—A. About $2,000,000,000. All except about 500,000 veterans have borrowed the limit allowed by law on their certificates.

Eighteenth. Q. If this amount of money is needed in circulation, would it not be better for the country to provide that amount for public buildings or highway construction?—A. No; because it would not be so well distributed in that way; it would go to certain localities and certain cities and only to people engaged in that kind of work. If it is paid to the veterans, it will go into every nook and corner of America; will raise the per-capita circulation of money about $15, can be paid immediately without waiting for blueprints, and will place purchasing power into the hands of consumers who will put it into circulation.

Nineteenth. Q. You are asking that money be distributed to one class, are you not?—A. No; every class, race, and creed; every occupation, avocation, trade, and business will get a share. It is the only plan yet suggested that will cause such a wide distribution of money to such a large number of consumers without payment of a dole.

Twentieth. Q. Are you asking for a revision of the contract?—A. Yes; in order that another part of the contract, the legislative intent, may be carried out. Congress contemplated that the veterans should be paid the adjusted pay as of the time the services were rendered and not 7 years later without interest. The report of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House reporting the adjusted-compensation legislation in the year 1924 states two objects they had in mind, as follows: "That it should represent an amount approximately equal to the difference between what the soldier received and what he should have received. That it should confer substantial benefits upon the soldiers." The first object is not carried out by paying the veterans the amount representing that difference 7 years later. The second object is not carried out if the money is paid in dribs and a large part of the principal consumed by the payment of compound interest on loans.

Twenty-first. Q. Have others ever asked the Government for a revision of contracts?—A. Yes; the foreign countries that borrowed billions from us asked for a revision of their contracts. In the revision that was granted them they were given more than $10,000,000,000 by our Government. Hundreds of thousands of income-tax payers have asked the Government to revise their income-tax returns and allow them credits, refunds, and abatements. This has been done and more than 3½ billion dollars refunded in that manner. The income-tax returns were prepared wholly by the ones wanting the refunds, yet they asked for a revision and got it. The foreign countries asking for a revision of their contracts were parties to the contracts and had a voice in their making. The veteran had no other alternative than to accept the adjusted-service certificate in the form in which it was offered to him. He did not make it out and agree to it like the income-tax payers or the foreign countries.

Twenty-second. Q. Did the veterans not agree to accept payment in 1945?—A. No. They were told what would be given them and were never asked to enter into any agreement at all.

Twenty-third. Q. While a mechanic enlisted as a soldier, what was received by mechanics who stayed at home?—A. As everyone knows, they received America's all-time high wages for mechanics. Laborers were paid as much as $6 and $8 a day, and the soldier, through service, probably lost from $1 to $10 a day as compared with what he could have made had he not served with the armed forces. The adjustment that was made of his compensation was only a partial adjustment. During the war some laborers in shipyards, doing piece work, are reported to have made as high as $70 a day. Of course, such cases were exceptional.

Twenty-fourth. Q. Did the United States pay her soldiers more than any other country engaged in the war?—A. The United States paid a private $30, while Canada paid her privates $33. New Zealand, $36.60, and Australia, $43.10 a month. When the corporal in the United States Army was receiving $36 a month, the Australian corporal was receiving $72.90. While the sergeant in the United States Army was receiving $38 a month, the Australian sergeant was receiving $76.10 a month.

Twenty-fifth. Q. Is it not a fact that the 25-percent increase that the Government allowed the veteran in addition to his $1 and $1.25 a day was intended to compensate him for the loss of interest from 1917–18 to 1925?—A. No; the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the reports of the committees reporting the legislation in Congress clearly disclose that there was no such intent. Congress intended, as disclosed by these records, that the 25 percent would compensate the veteran for waiting from 1925 to 1945 for his money. As positive and convincing evidence that the 25-percent increase was not to compensate the veterans for waiting until 1925 from the time the services were rendered, the ones receiving $50 or less in cash did not receive the 25-percent increase, neither did the beneficiaries of the ones who died prior to the passage of the act receive the 25-percent increase. In other words, a veteran who served 105 days during the war was paid $60 on discharge. After the Adjusted Compensation Act was passed, and in 1925, he was paid $45 additional. He was not paid the 25-percent increase which he would have been paid if it was intended to cover the period between the time he rendered the services until 1925. The widow of a veteran who died in the service and who was entitled to a claim of $460 received $400 in 1925, $60 was deducted, and the $400 was paid without the 25-percent increase. These two illustrations are convincing proof that Mr. Spafford and Mr. Kinsolving are wrong. Further, Mr. Andrew Mellon, when he was Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Ogden Mills, when he was Under Secretary, both testified before the Senate committee in opposition to my bill, and both admitted in my presence that the 25 percent extra was for waiting from 1925 to 1945 and was not intended as interest from 1917–18 to 1925.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, in the last session of Congress I voted to sustain the President's veto because I was opposed to any inflationary method of payment of the adjusted-service certificates. I have not changed my mind so far as the method of payment is concerned, not that I am alarmed lest the issuance of $2,000,000,000 of greenbacks would impair the credit of the United States when we have approximately $10,000,000,000 in gold and $1,000,000,000 in silver. We might well issue $2,000,000,000, as has been said by the gentleman from Texas, and we would still have a sound dollar; but I voted against the principle, and am still against the principle, of paying these certificates through inflationary methods. There is no more reason to pay the adjusted-service certificates in this manner through starting the printing press than there is to pay for the maintenance of the Army, or the Navy, or to pay the salaries of Members of Congress, or to pay the running expenses of the Government, or even to reduce the national debt. Once you invoke this inflationary principle, there is no end to it, and your dollar will automatically be depreciated down to 20, 10, or even 5 cents, as occurred in Germany, and Soviet Russia, and every country that sought to pay its bills by printing-press money.

For some time I have been in favor of the payment of these certificates and propose to vote for this bill as a relief measure. Billions of dollars have been doled out in all directions by this administration to various groups for plowing under crops, for destroying cotton, and for the birth control of pigs, and there is no reason why the veterans should be discriminated against. Many of these veterans are unemployed, many of them are destitute, most of them owe money, many of them are in need of relief, and as long as we have made a contract with the veterans and are obligated to pay them these certificates, this is the proper time to pay them—right now. [Applause.]

Furthermore, when we entered into this contract in 1925—and I voted for it then over the veto of a Republican President, President Coolidge—we entered into that contract on a sound-dollar basis. Since then this administration has reduced the dollar to 59 cents. Who knows but this dollar may again be depreciated? The veterans, naturally, want it paid now and do not want to take the risk of being paid in a 20-cent dollar or in a 10-cent dollar later on.

I have not risen here, however, for the purpose of presenting the merits of the proposal. Every Member of the House, Republican or Democratic, has already made up his mind how he proposes to vote on this bill. I have risen to discuss the main feature of this bill, that is, how it is to be paid. There are four methods. First, there is the ordinary and regular method of payment through bond issues, which has been the method of this administration in all its authorized payments; second, is the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] payment through greenbacks or printing-press money, or through inflation; third, is a suggestion that has been made on the floor of this House by myself and others to take $2,000,000,000 out of the Public Works funds and other unexpended balances. The fourth is a suggestion that I propose to make to the Congress at the present time. After all, what the people throughout the country are worrying about with regard to the passage of the bill is whether it will mean more taxes. How is it going to affect the people of the country, not only the taxpayers, but the wage earners, who pay no direct income taxes but through increased cost of living because of inflation and idle factories because of the burden of taxation are vitally interested.

I offer in all seriousness this suggestion as a means to pay the bill: On the 30th of January 2 years ago the Congress authorized the President to establish a fund of $2,000,000,000 to stabilize the dollar. This money was put in charge of the Secretary of the Treasury as a secret fund. There has been no accounting of this money whatsoever to the Congress of the United States. In all fairness to the Secretary of the Treasury, I assume this money still exists and that it has not been dissipated. It was turned over as an emergency measure, purely for an emergency, and was so written in the law. This $2,000,000,000 fund was credited to the exchange-stabilization fund and made available to the Secretary of the Treasury under section 10 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934, enacted January 30, 1934, which expires on the 30th day of this January. This secret stabilization fund expires on January 30, 1936, unless the President issues a proclamation that the emergency still exists and that there is a necessity for the continuation of the fund, under which conditions it can be continued for not exceeding 1 year.

Now, I submit, in accordance with every statement made by this administration and its spokesmen, that we are out of the emergency. This being an emergency measure, therefore, it expires automatically the 30th of this month; and in view of the fact that the President says that we have a sound dollar and in view of the fact he says that there has been no impairment of the national credit, I submit that the Congress ought to pass a resolution recalling this $2,000,000,000 on January 30 and apply it to the payment of the adjusted-service certificates. [Applause.] If you did that, you would be taking a step in the right direction.

I am opposed to placing in the hands of any President or Secretary of the Treasury, be he Democrat or be he Republican, a secret fund of $2,000,000,000 to play with, with no accounting whatever to any Member of Congress, not even the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The distinguished gentleman from New York referred to the $2,000,000,000 gold-stabilization fund as a secret fund and stated that there has been no accounting of it. The gentleman had in his hand a moment ago, as I understand it, a Treasury statement issued daily. Will the gentleman agree with me that this $2,000,000,000 gold-stabilization fund appears in each Treasury statement made daily?

Mr. FISH. I can say to the gentleman only that there has been absolutely no accounting of it whatever. I do not know whether it is $2,000,000,000, $2,500,000,000, or $500,000,000; and the gentleman does not know it, either.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The point about it is that the gentleman stated there had been no accounting. I want the gentleman, who is usually frank, and who is courageous in meeting a point, to state whether or not that complete, full stabilization fund created in the amount of $2,000,000,000 appears daily in the Treasury statement as gold on hand.

Mr. FISH. Of course, I hope the money is on hand. It should be there. I have no way of knowing—and no Member of Congress has any way of knowing—just what the situation is. An accounting is made only once a year to the President of the United States. He probably knows. The Secretary of the Treasury probably knows. But I defy any Member of Congress to find out anything with reference to how much money is there or what they have done with it. Yesterday we received information that the Treasury Department had entered into some monetary treaty with Mexico. I do not know what right it has to negotiate a treaty with Mexico without the consent of the Senate or the Congress of the United States, but that is going on. I am opposed to a continuation of this secret fund. I want it restored to the Congress of the United States to be used to pay the adjusted-service certificates of the World War veterans. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to my colleague from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Is it not a fact that the Government, as a result of the profit received from this gold deal, has already charged this profit back against its own losses?

Mr. FISH. No; there should be two billions in the secret stabilization fund. Let us keep the record straight, because this should not be a partisan matter. The question of payment of the bonus will not be a partisan matter until action is taken by the Executive. If he vetoes the bill and tries to increase taxes, then the Democrats will have to take the responsibility.

When they depreciated the value of the dollar to 59 cents, the Government profited to the extent of $2,800,000,000. Two billion dollars was set aside in a stabilization fund. Six hundred and seventy-five million dollars was used to pay off "circulation bonds", known as United States consuls, and some Panama bonds which were outstanding at that time. Also, an estimated $139,000,000 has been used to purchase stock in the Federal Reserve to effect loans to industry through the F. D. I. C., under section 13 (e) of the F. D. I. C. Act. This came from the profit made on the devaluation of the dollar; and if it can be used for loans to industry, it can be used, now that the emergency has ended, to pay the adjusted-service certificates without increased taxation.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The gold which is set aside for this stabilization fund is gold bullion. It is not money; it is gold bullion. I suggested the other day that we coin this gold and silver and pay these veterans in money. Is that what the gentleman is agreeing to?

Mr. FISH. I should be perfectly willing to do that. I do not care how it is used. We have the money, and it may be used for this specific purpose, and, as a matter of fact, it should be, because the veterans' contract was made on that gold basis in 1925.

Mr. RANKIN. Then we would have currency expansion to the extent of $2,000,000,000.

Mr. FISH. I am not worrying about such an expansion. I am worrying about the principle of enacting legislation that would start the printing presses. In this case you can avoid the principle. This money has been set aside and may be recalled without the necessity of a tax, and should be recalled and used for the payment of the veterans' adjusted-service certificates.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. A question was asked the gentleman by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] with reference to the $2,000,000,000. When they devalued the dollar there was a profit of $2,800,000,000 from that devaluation. On the Federal statement in that year they charged off the $2,000,000,000, and it is not shown on the statement today.

Mr. FISH. I thank the gentleman for his observation, because I could not honestly answer the question, as I have not got a copy of the daily Treasury statement before me.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What is the purchasing power of the dollar today as compared with 1928 and 1929?

Mr. FISH. What we are trying to do is to get back to 1925 and 1926, when this obligation to the veterans was entered into.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am asking the gentleman what the purchasing power of the dollar is today as compared with 1928 and 1929.

Mr. FISH. I am concerned with its purchasing power in 1925, when this contract was entered into, not in 1929.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The gentleman is not answering the question.

Mr. FISH. And I do not propose to either. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BOILEAU. Does the gentleman propose to make gold coins out of the $2,000,000,000 in gold, or issue currency backed up by the $2,000,000,000 of gold bullion?

Mr. FISH. I am in favor of using the $2,000,000,000 to pay the certificates in cash.

Mr. BOILEAU. Then why not back the Patman bill, which has four times more gold back of it?

Mr. FISH. Because that is exactly what I am trying to avoid to have Congress vote—to start the printing press going.

Mr. BOILEAU. But there is four times more gold back of the Patman bill than behind the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. FISH. I have previously made the statement that $2,000,000,000 would not upset the finances of the United States. I am against the principle involved, and the $2,000,000,000 is already available; and I am now informed that $1,800,000,000 is carried specifically under the heading of "Exchange stabilization fund."

The President on last Monday sent a Budget message to Congress, if you could give it such a name, because it was a hollow mockery and a travesty as a Budget message. It was a "phoney" or "baloney" Budget. The President even went on to state in it: "We are approaching the balancing of the Budget", in spite of the fact that even the President's alleged Budget showed a deficit of $1,000,000,000. Now this is the phoney part of it. He ignored and left out $2,000,000,000 which will be necessary to carry on relief. This will create a deficit of two and one-half billion dollars. He omitted, of course—and we can excuse him for that—$500,000,000 which will have to be paid in processing taxes, since the Supreme Court held the A. A. A. unconstitutional. This will create a deficit of three and one-half billion dollars. The President omitted—and this is natural—any consideration of the bonus; and I am not blaming him for that, because it would not be fair. However, when the bonus is paid there will be a deficit of five and one-half billion dollars. That is why it is a "phoney" or "baloney" Budget message and absurd to refer to the approaching balancing of the Budget when, as a matter of fact and in all fairness, there will be a deficit of five and a half billion dollars tomorrow afternoon when this bill is passed by the House of Representatives.

This is not a partisan matter, but the question naturally arises, How is it going to be paid? Where is the money coming from? You have soaked and swatted the rich to the limit. You have soaked the millionaires 75 percent of their income. In the State of California they have a tax of 20 percent of the Federal tax, which means 15 percent more, or a total of 90 percent. In addition to that there is the real-estate tax, the city and town taxes, school tax, gasoline tax, sales tax, and dog tax.

As I estimated it out there in California, it amounts to 101 percent. [Laughter.]

Now, after having done this, you are not going to get much more money by soaking and swatting the rich. I have been a liberal for 20 years, and I am not here to defend any 56 rich men in America. I have two of them in my own district, and both of them are Democrats. You know them both. One is Mr. Vincent Astor, of yachting fame; and the other is Mr. Averill Harriman, until recently assistant director of the late lamented N. R. A. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question before commencing his statement?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COX. I was wondering if the gentleman would yield to the gentleman from New York, who has just surrendered the floor, the time to state to the House whether, by what he has just stated, he intends to advocate restoring to the dollar its former gold content?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I may say to the gentleman from Georgia that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] speaks here quite often, and the gentleman from New York can answer that question for himself on some other occasion and in his own time.

Mr. Speaker, there will be no doubt about the adoption of this rule, which is a liberal rule allowing debate and amendment. It is what we call an open rule and is the kind of rule requested by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means.

The question in the bill that is up for our consideration is a familiar one to all the Members of the House, because it has been before us many times. I think an injustice to the soldiers who served in the World War is about to be righted. The Congress has recognized this debt to the soldiers of the World War on the basis of compensation that they earned. During their period of service wages in this Nation were high; profits were running at a high-water mark. The soldiers alone served at a very meager wage. To adjust this and place on a parity the wages that were earned by the soldier the Congress recognized this payment.

According to my theory, it should have been paid when the task was finished at the end of the war. The laborer is always worthy of his hire, and when he has earned his wage he is entitled to have it paid; but now, some 17 years after the close of the war, we are righting an injustice that should have been righted at the time. Every other industry or corporation that had a claim against the United States Government growing out of the war, involving compensation or contracts that were unfinished, has been paid and paid in cash. The soldier never had any option in the matter, but had to take the certificate that was given him. It was not a two-sided contract. It was legislation that he never desired, but which he accepted because no alternative was offered. I believe this amount has been earned and ought to have been paid. I have always voted for it and have always voted to override every Presidential veto.

In addition, I think at this particular time great benefits will accrue to the Nation. We talk about purchasing power and we talk about the necessities that have arisen from the depression. There can be no better way in which there can be a distribution of Government funds that will be as fair and equal from a geographical standpoint as to pay this obligation to the soldier population, which is distributed over the entire Nation, township by township and county by county, on the basis of total population. So the purchasing power of the Nation will be increased by paying this debt now and allowing these soldiers to pay their debts, to purchase the necessities of life, to purchase new equipment, to set themselves up in business, to pay their debts, and to put money in the channels of commerce and trade so as to help move the machinery of industry in all lines of endeavor.

Of course, there is not involved in this bill the manner of payment. This has been in previous bills, but all veterans' organizations and all groups in this House have agreed that this question, temporarily at least, should be waived in the interest of the payment to the soldiers themselves of this debt, and that that question should not be involved in the legislation at this time.

This is an authorization. After the authorization has been enacted by the Congress, then an appropriation bill will come at a later date. With this amount involved I take it that the Congress may be called upon to designate the manner in which the payment shall be made. Perhaps new taxes may be suggested in order to meet a debt of this size, or, perhaps, bonds may be used. I am one who has been in favor of using the idle gold and silver that lie in the Treasury of the United States to pay this debt, on the same theory that a businessman, you and I, if we owed a debt to an individual or to a bank, and had money on deposit, would pay it out of our resources rather than create a new debt in order to pay an old one.

This idle gold, variously estimated at from one to two and a half billion dollars—I do not know the exact amount; I have not examined the statement of the Treasury recently; but the amount has been growing, and it is stated there is over $700,000,000 of profits on the purchase of silver, and that there is $250,000,000, approximately, in the fund that has been accumulated to meet the payment of these certificates when they matured in 1945; but in the profits on the revaluation of gold itself there are sufficient funds in the Treasury of the United States, whether it be in coin or whether it be in bullion, aside from the stabilization fund, to pay this debt and save the interest on any interest-bearing bonds that might be issued.

I never could understand why anyone should reach the conclusion that when this debt is fixed as to amount and the Congress should decide on the policy of using the idle gold and silver that is already there to pay it, that this would open the floodgates in the future to the issuance of more money. The Congress of the United States controls the situation, and because they vote for this fixed amount of expansion of the currency necessarily does not fix the policy of the future with respect to some future item of appropriation.

I am one who believes we should have this expansion of the currency. I believe it would help purchasing power and raise the prices of commodities and solve the very problems that this special legislation of farm relief and other legislation have been designed to improve by way of raising farm prices.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. COX. Are we to understand that the gentleman is advocating payment along the lines of the Patman plan?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Certainly. The gentleman understands that I voted for the Patman plan and I am still in favor of it. However, I am not in favor of that just to confuse the issue so far as the payment at this particular time, whatever method is approved.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. If that gold and silver profit in the Treasury is not used in some way, preferably in this way, of what value was it to devalue the dollar to obtain that profit?

Mr. GREENWOOD. There is some value to the credit of the United States, both domestically and internationally, that we have this reserve of gold standing there behind our indebtedness as a reserve to meet obligations; but there never was a time when the credit of this Nation at home or abroad was better than it is at this hour. When the bonds of the Nation are offered, even at the lowest rate of interest ever offered in the history of our country, they are oversubscribed four and five times, because these resources, not only of credit but of gold and silver, lie there in the Treasury. There is some advantage. But I agree with the gentleman that in this particular instance, in order to save the interest on bonds in the future, which would be double the amount which would be involved in the payment of the debt, we can very well use this surplus gold and silver upon which to issue Treasury notes or gold certificates or any money that is backed by that gold and silver or credit of the United States, and with that gold and silver pay this debt that is fixed in amount, and is not as wide open as some of you gentlemen seem to believe it is.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Yes.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I am much interested in the able speech of the gentleman from Indiana, but why debate this question when we all know, and this House has demonstrated it time after time, that we are overwhelmingly in favor of the bonus, and that we have the votes to pass it over a veto if necessary?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I am not trying to convince the gentleman. I know he believes probably as I do about that. I am stating my personal views, because I believe at a future date an appropriation bill will come before this House to decide that question, and I am merely stating my personal views in regard to the matter.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PATMAN) there were—ayes 148, noes 0.

So the resolution was agreed to.

ADDRESS BEFORE THE NATIONAL CONVENTION OF THE VETERANS OF FOREIGN WARS

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address recently delivered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER] before the national convention of the Veterans of Foreign Wars at New Orleans, La., on September 18, 1935:

INTRODUCTION

Mr. Commander and comrades, it is an honor to address this organization of men who have crossed the seas and the boundaries of their own native land to fight an enemy of the American people and its institutions.

As a veteran of none too glorious experience who also happens to be a Member of the American Congress and who dwells in the Southland just to the east of the mighty Mississippi River, I should like to add on behalf of the veterans of the South, and particularly those whom I have the honor to represent, a word of welcome to you who come from other sections of our common country. I am sure that you have immensely enjoyed the hospitality which is so peculiar to this section, and I trust that the remainder of your stay will afford an opportunity for a continuation of a pleasant visit to the unique and historic city of New Orleans and our sun-kissed Southland.

In the brief time on this rostrum I desire to discuss with you some phases of the legislative program affecting veterans in the National Congress; the duty of the people of the country as a whole to the veterans; and to respectfully remind you of your corresponding responsibility to the country which is so heavily indebted to you.

LEGISLATION AND PUBLIC OPINION

It is only fitting that the Veterans of Foreign Wars, who fought for the preservation of their country, should have a powerful voice and a keen interest in its legislative affairs. But in the outset, may I not remind you that any legislative program, sponsored by a veterans' organization, should never be allowed to get ahead of public opinion. Laws are but expressions of public opinion written into codes of law. A dangerous, if not fatal, mistake too often made by those who have the interest and welfare of the veterans at heart is to attempt legislation for the welfare of the veteran for which the proper background in the forum of public opinion has not been established.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars and all other organizations who would seek to better the conditions of the veterans themselves should always bear in mind two things: First, the American people are a grateful people; they are desirous of seeing to it that the men who offered their all as a living sacrifice upon the altar of their country should be well and amply cared for. And, second, that before presenting their program to the several States' legislatures and the National Congress, the justice and desirability of that program should first receive the approval of this great American people. This should be done by a campaign of enlightenment and education as to the merit and justice of the proposed legislation. In my opinion, if this procedure is followed, no meritorious legislation will fail at the hands of the legislative body before which the legislation is considered.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Unquestionably the outstanding piece of legislation affecting the veteran, and, in my opinion, the most important piece of legislation affecting the country at the session of Congress to be convened in January next will be the consideration of the immediate payment of the veterans' adjusted-service certificates. This question has long been before the American people; every veteran here is so familiar with its provisions, with its trials and its controversies, that I shall not dwell upon it at length. Moreover, there is a man present at this convention who is better fitted to discuss this matter than any other man in the United States. I refer, of course, to the Honorable WRIGHT PATMAN, the outstanding friend of the American veteran, one of the ablest men in the American Congress, and the man who has fought in season and out of season for the immediate payment of these certificates. Like all strong men who have waged the battles for principles and justice in the past, he has incurred the ill will of those who oppose him. But the rank and file of the American veterans, of the Legion, of the disabled veterans, and of the Veterans of Foreign Wars realize that the fight that WRIGHT PATMAN has made has been their fight. When those certificates are cashed the law authorizing the payment may not bear the name of PATMAN, but every veteran who presents his certificate for payment is bound to realize that he is receiving his pay at the time because of the valiant efforts made by WRIGHT PATMAN. As one who has served on the steering committee for the payment of these certificates in the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses, and who has had first-hand opportunity to observe his efforts, I feel in a position to state, beyond the ability of anyone to successfully deny, that PATMAN of Texas, is the most potent influence in the Congress and in the country for a square deal for the American veterans. All honor to him.

This issue of the immediate payment of the veterans' adjusted-service certificates has dragged too long. There are those who have made of it a political football, tossing it about upon the gridiron of politics. The certificates should be paid now. Their payment is in line with the program of the present administration. The American people want these certificates paid. And it is my confident opinion that the bill authorizing their payment will be passed and become a law, with or without the signature of the President, before March 1 of next year. The only fight, as I see it, will be one on the question of compromise. Personally, I think that no compromise should be made, and, moreover, it is my opinion that if our forces will stand fast no compromise will be necessary.

I could not pass from this subject without calling your attention to an inherent danger to the payment of these certificates that lies apparent to all thoughtful American veterans; that is, the danger of a division among the veterans themselves. There are those even in the veterans' organizations who at heart are opposed to the immediate payment of these certificates. They would divide the veterans into two camps; they would have the several veterans' organizations sponsor different bills providing for the payment of these certificates. As one who believes in the fundamental principle that the average American veteran is not concerned about the method of payment, I would urge those occupying positions of trust and honor in the various veterans' organizations to unite their strength in the common cause for the immediate payment of these certificates. Let Congress, whose responsibility it is, determine how that payment is to be financed. The Congress unquestionably is sold upon the immediate payment of these certificates. Congress should not be put in the attitude of having to decide between various groups of veterans. The leading veterans' organizations should agree upon a common program and present a united front.

Personally I have always favored the procedure outlined in H. R. 1. To that end I have supported the Patman bill with all of my energy, and will continue to do so, but the immediate cash payment of the certificates is my primary motive, as it is of WRIGHT PATMAN himself, and I think it is primarily the motive of every Member of Congress who favors the payment of these certificates. If I might be so bold as to suggest a procedure for the veterans themselves, it would be that those entrusted to the leadership of the various veterans' organizations should get together about the council table and agree upon a procedure of urging the Congress and the President to pay these certificates early next year, leaving to them the matter of financing the program. If this is done and a united front is presented by the veterans themselves, there is no power in this country that can stop the payment of these certificates before March 1, 1936.

WAR CLOUDS

You, my comrades, fought well the cause of our united country in its time of peril. Your cause has always been a just one. You drove the enemy from a small continent and set up a new and free republic where despotism had reigned. Later your comrades in arms braved the seas infested with deadly submarines, when the Germans were hammering at the gates of Paris, and extinguished a conflagration which threatened civilization and Christianity. Your humanitarian and patriotic record of achievements is scintillating and resplendent. Long may your memory be acclaimed by a grateful and appreciative American people.

The memory of your brilliant achievement; the toll of death and casualties caused; the billions in wealth destroyed, all are too fresh in the American mind for us to be swept off of our feet by the impending European strife. America must not become embroiled in this maelstrom of European diplomacy which can have but one result—war. America's course is clear; it was charted by the greatest of all Americans, George Washington, in his Farewell Message to the Congress when he advised us to steer clear of European alliances and entanglements. I hope that in this instance the American people will follow his advice.

CONCLUSION

The veterans of all wars in America occupy a unique and strategic position in the affairs of this great country. United, they can wield a powerful influence in shaping the political, social, economic, and civic affairs of this country. Today they are the most powerful group in the country. That power has a corresponding responsibility. It should be used for no selfish purpose. As a military organization in the war period, its full and destructive power was thrown at the enemy with the sole patriotic purpose of winning the war. In periods of peace and of economic strife the full force and effort of that influence should be felt in all constructive efforts bent toward the glorification and preservation of our common country. We should always remember that we are members of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, we are members of the American Legion, we are members of the Disabled American Veterans, but always we should remember first that we are Americans. We owe an everlasting duty to the welfare of our living comrades; we owe a solemn duty to ever hold aloft the torch passed on to us by those who paid with the supreme sacrifice to see to it that the sacrifice of their lives for the preservation of the Government and its institutions was not made in vain.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 9, 1936.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that on January 6, 1936, the Senate adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. HENRY W. KIMBALL, late a Representative from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now adjourn.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 430. An act for the relief of Anna Hathaway.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 381) entitled "An act for the relief of the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians located in Utah, Colorado, and New Mexico", requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, Mr. BULOW, and Mr. FRAZIER to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9870, with Mr. BLANTON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 2 hours.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, it is most gratifying to witness the united front presented by the major veteran organizations and the friends of the veterans in the House in support of the bill now under consideration, H. R. 9870, introduced by me. It has the united support of the major veteran organizations, the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, and the Disabled American Veterans. I drafted the bill and introduced it at the request of the three major veteran organizations above referred to with my good friends, JOHN W. MCCORMACK, of Massachusetts, and WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas, long-time ardent advocates of the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates, its cosponsors with me.

The original bill in this session was introduced in the House immediately after the gavel sounded on the first day of this session. It was H. R. 9500. In the main, it followed the bill which I introduced in the last session which was favorably reported out by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, H. R. 3896. Except for the new money features of H. R. 1, introduced by Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN, there was no major difference in the two measures considered last session. It will be remembered that H. R. 3896 was very carefully considered by the Ways and Means Committee in the last session before it was favorably reported to the House. In consequence of which it was thought that consideration of the measure this session would be facilitated and expedited before the committee and House by using a bill with which they were familiar as a base and with such changes as were deemed proper.

POINTS IN AGREEMENT BETWEEN H. R. 9870 AND H. R. 3896

Each bill provided for the immediate cash payment in full of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates.

Each bill provided for the cancelation of all interest accrued.

Each bill provided an authorization for the appropriation of moneys necessary to carry out the provision of the act.

H. R. 9500 was carefully considered by the Ways and Means Committee in conjunction with Hon. Frank W. Hines, Administrator of the Veterans' Administration, and Assistant Administrator Breining, and others, and certain amendments were adopted by the committee. The refund of interest paid by veterans was stricken, and the interest rate on special obligation to the United States Government life-insurance fund was increased to 4½ percent per annum. The preamble was stricken. The payment to an applicant who died after filing application for cash payment, but before his claim was proved, was changed so that payment will be made to his estate rather than to the beneficiary. A new bill, H. R. 9870, was introduced by me and was favorably reported out by the committee January 7, 1936, by a vote of 24 to 0.

Each bill received favorable report from the Ways and Means Committee—H. R. 3896 by a vote of 23 to 1 and H. R. 9870 by a vote of 24 to 0.

MAJOR POINTS OF DIFFERENCE BETWEEN H. R. 9870 AND H. R. 3896

(a) H. R. 9870 reduces the immediate cash outlay to the Treasury by $490,000,000 with use of a special obligation or bond to the United States Government Life Insurance Fund in the payment of principal and interest on loans made by such fund to veterans upon certificates.

(b) While providing for immediate cash payment in full to all certificate holders who desire it, H. R. 9870 permits those who do not desire cash at this time to hold their certificates with a 3-percent interest rate as an inducement. It is believed that this will relieve the pressure on the Treasury at this time of more than $500,000,000.

THE NEW FEATURES

It will be noted that the two major differences are the provisions for the payment of interest to those who do not cash their certificates until after April 6, 1937, and the special obligation or bond to the United States Government life-insurance fund, which we believe will save at least $1,000,000,000 in the immediate cash outlay hereunder. We will endeavor to present the viewpoint of these two features of the bill which have not appeared in any bill that has been considered by the House of Representatives heretofore.

Mention will be made in the debate about manners and methods of payment. The veterans' organizations and the gentlemen sponsoring this bill have agreed that amendments dealing with methods might confuse the issue. Heretofore veterans and friends of veterans have divided over paths of payment. This bill comes to you from the Committee on Ways and Means and provides regular authority for an appropriation.

It should be stated that only two committees of the House have the power of appropriation. Since the Budget law only two committees of this House have such power. I know that there are gentlemen in the House who are friends of the veterans and the country who have certain amendments they would like to offer for paying money out of certain funds and paying it in a certain way. I want to call to their attention that it is upon these rocks that cash-payment legislation has struck and floundered. I hope that friends of the veterans of the World War in the House will present a united front and send this bill over to the other body by overwhelming vote without extraneous matter.

After the veto of the bill last year by the President, which bill had the new money payment feature, I had several conferences with one of the ablest men in the House and one of the most practical men I ever came in contact with and a man who has good, sound business judgment. It was his firm conviction that the Congress of the United States, in the payment of these certificates, should relieve as much as possible the immediate cash outlay burden upon the Treasury of the United States. The gentleman to whom I refer is none other than our distinguished colleague, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON. [Applause.]

It was his thought that under the bills that have heretofore passed the House, immediate cash payment in full was provided not only to those who needed it but to those who did not need it; those who wanted it and those who did not want it. In other words, all the bills that have previously passed the House provided immediate full cash payment of all adjusted certificates at one time, whether holders wanted to cash them or not.

Now, I hasten to state that the bill under discussion, H. R. 9870, provides for immediate full cash payment of all certificates to those who want the cash at the time of its enactment or who will want the cash between then and January 1, 1945. It was thought originally that bonds might be issued and delivered to those veterans who did not desire to get their cash for their certificates. Later the thought came to me that in the signing of the application for the bonds and the manual delivery of the certificate to the Veterans' Administration that the certificate holder might well decide to make out the application for the cash payment. He might not need to secure the cash, but if he had the trouble of going to his safety-deposit box or his private safe, bureau drawer, or other receptacle and send in his certificate for the bond, he might well conclude, "I'll just get the cash."

So the machinery herein was devised to take the place of the issuance of bonds which would bear 3-percent interest to be exchanged for the certificates.

INTEREST ON CERTIFICATES

Section 4 of the bill reads as follows:

SEC. 4. If an application under this act for payment of the certificate of any veteran is not made prior to maturity of the certificate or is not filed prior to April 6, 1937, interest shall accrue on such certificate at the rate of 3 percent per annum. Such interest shall be computed on a principal amount equal to the face value of the certificate less any indebtedness of the veteran on account of the principal of any loan or loans secured by such certificate. Such interest shall begin to accrue on the day after the date of enactment of this act, or the date of issuance of the certificate, whichever is the later date, and shall continue to accrue until January 1, 1945, death of the veteran, or payment of the certificate upon an application therefor under this act, whichever is the earliest date. The accrued interest shall be paid by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs upon payment of the certificate under this act or the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended.

In the above section you will find the machinery that permits those who desire to hold their certificates, whether they have borrowed on them or not, to cash those certificates between the date of the enactment of the act and April 6, 1937. If they cash their certificates within that period, they get the face value of the certificates in cash, less the principal of any loan which may have been made, the interest being canceled under section 2. As an inducement, to relieve the strain and burden on the Treasury, the section provides that if the certificates are not cashed prior to April 6, 1937—and I may say that date is the twentieth anniversary of our entry into the war—then the holders of those certificates, subsequent to that date, may cash them at any time prior to January 1, 1945, and receive 3-percent interest on the face value, if there is no loan, or upon the face value less the principal of any loan that may be made, and interest on the remainder at the rate of 3 percent per annum from the date of the enactment of the law until the obligation is met.

At the present time there are 494,000 veterans with an average of $1,000 per veteran who have not borrowed any money upon their certificates. There is $494,000,000 in amount, representing the matured value of the certificates, upon which no loans have been made.

Now, it seemed to us that if 494,000 veterans, aggregating five hundred millions in dollars, have not seen fit and have not had the need to take advantage of the 50-percent loan rights, it certainly is logical to say that most of that number will let their certificates ride and receive the same rate of interest that the man who purchased the bond would receive, the current rate of interest being 3 percent. In other words, instead of paying interest to the man who purchased the bond that procured the cash with which to pay in full those who did not need it, this 3-percent interest would be paid to the veteran himself.

Then there are many of those who have borrowed to the limit, who, in our judgment, would permit the remainder of their certificate to ride if, with cancelation of accrued interest and payment of loan, they secured 3-percent interest on the remainder. I think the committee is conservative in saying that at least $500,000,000 will be deferred in that way to those who do not need the cash at this particular time, and thereby reduce the amount of cash outlay by $500,000,000.

THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT LIFE-INSURANCE FUND

Section 5 of the bill reads as follows:

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to redeem from the United States Government life-insurance fund all adjusted-service certificates held by that fund on account of loans made thereon, and to pay to the United States Government life-insurance fund the amount of the outstanding liens against such certificates, including all interest due or accrued, together with such amounts as may be due under subdivision (m) of section 502 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make such payment by issuing, to the United States Government life-insurance fund, bonds of the United States which shall bear interest at the rate of 4½ percent per annum. No such bonds shall mature or be callable until the expiration of a period of at least 10 years from date of issue, except that any such bond shall be redeemed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the principal and accrued interest thereon paid to the United States Government life-insurance fund at any time upon certification by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs that the amount represented by such bond is required to meet current liabilities. Bonds issued for the purposes of this section shall be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, subject to the provisions of this section.

It developed that there was another item of $500,000,000 that might be deferred without doing injustice to any veteran who wants to get cash on his certificate at this time.

A number of years ago authority was given to the United States Government life-insurance fund to loan money in that fund to veterans upon their certificates. That has been going on for a number of years. It was going on when the interest rate was 2 percent in addition to the rate in the particular Federal Reserve district. It went along when the rate was 4½ percent. It continued after it was reduced to 3½ percent. We found that in that fund, if the certificates were immediately paid in cash, it would be necessary to take up $490,000,000 in its present assets. When the veterans came in and paid their loans and the accrued interest, or the Veterans' Administration did it for them, they would have $490,000,000 in cash, representing assets, liens on adjusted-service certificates, and accrued interest. Now, what would be the situation? If this transaction were a cash transaction, it would be necessary immediately for the United States Government life-insurance fund to go out into the market and purchase $490,000,000 of Government securities.

In lieu of that transaction, section 5 of this bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make payments of these obligations in the United States Government life-insurance fund by the issuance of bonds which would bear interest at the rate of 4½ percent per annum. In that way the Government life-insurance fund is held intact. In that way there is no necessity for selling $490,000,000 of bonds to the public, and payment of that $490,000,000 is deferred under this bill for at least 10 years. The bonds are not callable until 10 years, and that puts it past January 1, 1945, when under the original act, of course, it would have been liquidated.

In H. R. 9500 originally introduced, the interest rate on these Government bonds was fixed at 3½-percent interest. The reason for so doing was because the holders of adjusted-service certificates today pay into that fund 3½-percent interest on the loan. We felt that that was a proper rate. No more and no less than the present rate. General Hines and his associates were before our committee, and they called our attention to the fact that back in July 1932 there was legislation enacted, and now on the statute books, which requires an earning upon those certificates in the United States life-insurance fund of 4½ percent. There would be 1 percent difference between 4½ and 3½. Naturally, one would think that might be an added cost to the Government because of the enactment of this legislation, but that fund is only earning now 3½ percent on the loans made to veterans. General Hines is the authority for our committee and is my authority for the statement that the increase to this 4½-percent rate on the Government bond is no added cost because of this legislation.

THE REFUND OF INTEREST

H. R. 9500 contained a provision which related to refund of interest paid veterans. The committee last year, in the consideration of the adjusted-service-certificate measures, felt that that provision should not be inserted in that bill. In this session the committee struck the refund provision from this bill.

I think it is only fair to the committee to say, so far as the veterans' organizations are concerned, that while they would like to see the refund of interest carried in the bill, they do not propose to object to the action of the committee in striking it from the bill. Now, it must be understood that there is a material difference between the item of refund and the cancelation of accrued interest. The exact amount of the refund item cannot be known, but it is estimated, and the current figure used by the Veterans' Administration and others of us is a figure between $6,500,000 and $7,000,000, about $1,500,000 or $2,000,000 paid to the Veterans' Administration and the rest of it at the banks.

It can well be argued that if interest accrued upon the loans and remaining unpaid is to be canceled that the veteran who has paid interest upon the loan upon his certificate should have refund of such interest so paid. The Ways and Means Committee is very sympathetic to this point of view, but there were certain practical features that caused it to take the action it did. The three major veteran organizations recognize the existence of these practical difficulties. It is estimated that between six and one-half and seven million dollars is all that this refund item represents. About $2,000,000 represents the amount which the Veterans' Administration states has been paid by the veterans to them on their loans, and about four and one-half to five million dollars is the estimated amount of interest on loans upon certificates paid by the veterans to banks. It is stated that several thousands of these banks have closed their doors and have been completely liquidated, and much difficulty would be had in securing proof of interest paid which would be the subject of refund. Certainly, cases would develop where one veteran could make out his claim very clearly and satisfactorily, but other veterans would not be able so to do. Then the cost of the administration would be a very considerable item. It was stated that it might even total more than the refunds themselves. The necessity of checking up the various banks' books to secure the necessary evidence of payments would certainly require considerable work and entail heavy expense. There is another item that is quite important. In the event the matter of refund of interest would have to be determined, months of delay might ensue before the payment of the amount of the certificate could be made. Then some do not favor the cancelation of the accrued interest. This item amounts to nearly $300,000,000. The friends of the bill feel that the action of the committee in regard to this refund item should not be disturbed.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. Does not the gentleman from Kentucky feel that the method of payment should be contained in this bill so that we may all know what effect our vote will have on the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman what was his position in regard to the cash payment of the bonus in the last Congress?

Mr. MILLARD. That does not answer my question.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am asking the gentleman this question.

Mr. MILLARD. I was against it.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I wanted to know whether the gentleman was really friendly to our cause.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman now be so kind, please, as to answer my question?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman who just interrogated me is one of the good-hearted, best-natured gentlemen in the House—a very capable Representative in this body. He always knows the direction in which it is going. He always drives for a certain objective—and does it well.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 additional minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In the answer to questions of this kind, I solemnly ask the friends of the veterans in the House today to follow the same method that Ulysses and his sailors practiced when they were passing the islands of the Sirens. If necessary, stop up your ears lest you be persuaded by such clever maneuvers. The method of payment should not be injected into this bill at this time and place. As stated heretofore, it can only confuse the issue and does not have a proper place here under the rules of the House.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. MILLARD. Is that the best answer the gentleman can give to my question?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman state his question again, please?

Mr. MILLARD. My question was, Does not the gentleman feel that the method of payment should be contained in this bill, so that we may know the effect our vote will have on the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Now, let us deal with that; I am ready to answer that. Some question has been raised with reference to payment out of the emergency appropriations. Friends of this legislation believe that this thought is injected to bring confusion to our ranks; to cause an outside issue to weaken our front; to lose votes in another body; in short, to defeat our bill.

THE REGULAR METHOD UNDER HOUSE RULES

In the last Congress the method-of-payment argument was made, and the bill that passed the House carried a provision for the manner in which the payment was to be made. This bill passed the Senate and was vetoed by the President because the method of payment—new money—did not coincide with his views. We passed the bill over the veto in the House, but it failed of passage over the veto in the Senate.

Other gentlemen propose another method of payment, with the gold in the stabilization fund or money backed by that gold. The gold-stabilization fund has played a great part, in my opinion, in the recovery program. It has protected the American dollar from an attack abroad and has done valiant service. The mere fact that the gold is there, ready to be used, has proved of great benefit. Now, assume that we adopt this method of payment, then those who recognize the real worth of the gold-stabilization fund might be brought to oppose our bill. Those opposing the legislation certainly ought not to be blamed for their endeavor to kill it through indirection.

This bill is the regular, orderly method of procedure. This is an authorization bill, the only sort of bill the Ways and Means Committee, or any legislation committee in the House, can report. If we made an appropriation in this bill, some gentleman who might not be friendly to the legislation—and it might be my able friend from New York—would solemnly rise and say, "Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the bill because it carries an appropriation", and the Speaker, even though friendly to the legislation, would have to bow to the rules of the House, and the bill would be thrown out. So, again, I say let us not be lured from our paths by the music of our siren friends, however much we love them. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, before my colleague leaves this subject, will he yield for a question?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. As my colleague knows, I have always been, and am now, a friend of this legislation. I appreciate that the veterans' organizations have gotten together on a bill now. Could the gentleman give us some idea as to when we shall have an opportunity to provide an appropriation to carry out this authorization?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I may say to the gentleman that another body in the last session of Congress answered that question completely. In that other body the rules are not similar to ours. In the last session the language was changed under their parliamentary rules and an appropriation made in lieu of the authorization as originally appeared in H. R. 3896, which was considered in the House in the last session. If a similar course is pursued, that will be behind us. I may also say to my good friend from Kentucky that the independent offices appropriation bill is now pending in this body. It is the appropriation bill regularly carrying moneys for the Veterans' Administration. If we pass our bill, H. R. 9870, and it passes the Senate and becomes law, as I hope it will, there will be time to include this appropriation in the independent offices appropriation bill in another body. As the gentleman from Kentucky knows, since he has had experience in the other body, a majority vote is all that is required to place an appropriation in the independent offices appropriation bill that will carry into effect the mandate of the Congress.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I want further to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I think it is a wise policy to divide the issue and pass first on the question: Are you for or against the bonus, and then take up the other question of method.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Many veterans have borrowed on their adjusted-service certificates and have not paid up their interest. Will this interest be refunded?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes; that is cared for in section 2—the cancelation of interest.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question before he proceeds?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. What provision is made in this bill to protect the unemployed veteran? My point is simply this, If the gentleman will permit me to state it, that an unemployed veteran who at this time is receiving either direct relief or work relief, will the moment he receives payment of his adjusted-service certificate automatically be discharged? So far as the unemployed veteran is concerned, the payment of the bonus, as this bill now stands, amounts to nothing but a lump-sum relief payment. Is not this correct?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I would not agree with the gentleman that the payment herein is lump-sum relief payment. I understand the gentleman intends to offer an amendment covering that feature, and then we can thrash it out.

THE IMMEDIATE CASH OUTLAY

I want now to get down to the matter of immediate cash outlay and the release of present burden on the Treasury. The figures here given are as of January 1, 1936. They were furnished to us by the Veterans' Administration. The matured value of the outstanding certificates is $3,463,000,000. The interest to be canceled and refunded in H. R. 9500 is $297,350,000. With refund of interest out in H. R. 9870, the accrued interest to be canceled would amount to approximately $290,350,000. The sum total of the matured value of the certificates and the cancelation of interest therefore would be about $3,753,350,000. The value of the adjusted-service certificate fund is $1,471,000,000. Thus from figures given to us by the best authority possible it can be seen that the amount required to make immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates and cancel accrued interest would be about $2,282,350,000.

Undoubtedly $490,000,000 is taken care of in the United States Government life-insurance fund. More than $500,000,000, if our judgment is correct, will be taken care of in the matter of those who will get interest on their certificates. This totals $1,000,000,000. This reduces the $2,282,000,000 to $1,282,000,000.

In the independent offices appropriation bill, now pending in the House, there is contained an item of $160,000,000 carried for the adjusted-service-certificate fund. This is not enough. General Hines and the Veterans' Administration requested $190,000,000, but the Budget O. K.'d only $160,000,000. Evidently the Veterans' Administration thought that the adjusted-service-certificate fund should have been $190,000,000 on January 1 of this year. Why? Because the adjusted-service-certificate fund as of January 1, 1936, was $60,000,000 short. More than that, I have it over the signature of Mr. Breining himself, Assistant Administrator of the Veterans' Administration, that with the money in the adjusted-service-certificate fund as of January 1, 1936, $1,471,000,000, it is $64,000,000 shy. I said it was $60,000,000 short as of January 1, 1936. It was $60,000,000 short as of September 30, 1935, but as of January 1, 1936, the deficit was $64,000,000.

THE DEFICIT IN THE ADJUSTED-SERVICE-CERTIFICATE FUND

It was originally agreed that payments of $112,000,000 annually on January 1 of each calendar year for the 20-year period from the enactment of the original Adjusted Service Certificate Act would provide sufficient moneys, on January 1, 1945, to pay the adjusted-service certificates at their matured face value. We have an expressed admission that with the payments which have been made, which considerably exceed the $112,000,000 per year originally agreed upon, there is a deficit in the adjusted-service-certificate fund, as of January 1, 1936, of $64,000,000. Mr. Breining tells us, and we present the picture to the House, that if a $60,000,000 payment is made up as of January 1, 1936, and nine annual payments of $112,000,000 with earnings of 3-percent interest thereon, which certainly is more than the last long-term sold for, the adjusted-service-certificate fund would show a deficit on January 1, 1945, of approximately $293,000,000.

It is not the fault of the veteran that this fund is not up to proper level. The $293,000,000 deficit as of January 1, 1945, will accumulate because of the failure to have proper amounts appropriated, and certainly more than $100,000,000 should now be in the fund to finally realize $293,000,000 as of January 1, 1945. Sound business, it seems to us, would require that such moneys be in the fund, earning compound interest, rather than to await the day of reckoning and be required to raise the full amount of the deficit. So, with the $160,000,000 carried in the independent offices appropriation bill and the more than $100,000,000 which should be in this fund to avoid a deficit that, with the ordinary payments, must be there, we submit that the immediate cash outlay above that which will be raised, and should be raised this year as a matter of sound business financing, will not be more, in our opinion, than $1,000,000,000.

To add proof that the adjusted-service certificate fund has not been maintained, it is self-evident that the $112,000,000 annual payments originally agreed upon as the amount necessary to do the job is not enough. In the 11 annual appropriations made for the adjusted-service-certificate fund, through January 1, 1935, there is a total of $1,396,000,000, or an average of about $127,000,000 a year, and yet the fund is $64,000,000 shy as of January 1, 1936. These figures are official figures concerning which there can be no question.

With reference to the current interest rate—I call attention of the Members of Congress to the recent issue, aggregating $950,000,000 presented to the country by the Treasury and which was oversubscribed between four and five times. The rate of interest on these long-term bonds was 2⅞ percent per annum.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. CARPENTER. If the interest has been unpaid and is canceled, is it not a fair proposition to refund the interest which has already been paid by the veteran?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not think I would quarrel with the gentleman in regard to that. It was in the bill which I introduced. But because of certain administrative difficulties and expenses involved it was stricken out.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I gladly yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes of my time.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I shall be happy to answer any questions I can.

Mr. SEGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SEGER. There are a number of veterans, as I understand it, who have not made application for the adjusted-service certificates. Will they come under this bill?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes. During the last session of Congress legislation was passed extending the time in which they might file to 1940. If this bill is passed, those who have not filed an application for certificates may secure the rights under the certificate of get cash payment in full.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Assuming that a veteran made a loan and failed to pay the interest and did not care to take the balance at this time, would such a veteran have to pay interest on the money previously borrowed?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Does the gentleman mean if a veteran has a certificate and has not paid the interest?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The veteran has $1,000 due him, and he borrowed $500. He is now paying interest. He is not going to draw the other $500. Under those circumstances will he have to continue to pay interest on the $500 previously borrowed?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. No. The principal of the loan is paid, and the accrued interest will be canceled under the terms of this bill.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Some criticism has been offered that the certificates of the veterans include interest up to 1945, and therefore it would not be just to pay them now. Will the gentleman throw some light on that question?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is just a question of how you look at it. Of course, you can take your lead pencil and figure interest and arrive at a certain amount, but as far as I am concerned, my notion is that in an adjustment of pay for personal services rendered it goes back to the day and date that the service was rendered. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. Let us assume, for example, that I borrow $500 from my friend from Michigan and I give him a note payable in 1 month and I do not pay it. My friend, we will assume, waits for 5 years before bringing suit, assuming there is a statute of limitation of 6 years within which period he could bring suit. My friend would get interest, when judgment was entered, from the time he made the loan, and the position of the gentleman from Kentucky, as I understand it, is identically the same. The gentleman from Kentucky contends that the interest on this adjusted compensation should begin to run at the time it was made. Of course, technically, it should start to run from the day of discharge, but, obviously, that could not be done with 3,700,000 veterans having different dates of discharge, and therefore the one day that everybody could agree on was the actual termination of the war on November 11, 1918.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Let me suggest to my friend from Michigan——

Mr. DONDERO. The gentleman understands I am not criticizing but am asking the question for information.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I understand that, because I know the gentleman's position.

The maturity date of most of the certificates, under existing law, happens to be January 1, 1945. Why? The bill was passed in May, as I recall it, of 1924, and they used up about 6 months' time and January 1, 1925, was used as initial date. The first bill for cash payment was introduced in 1919. Certainly, if that bill had passed and it had been a 20-year proposition, the maturity date on the certificate would have been entirely different. The fact that January 1, 1925, is the date of the certificates is just because Congress had failed to do that which it ought to have done prior to that date.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. BIERMANN. Was not the basis of the adjusted compensation $1 a day for service in this country and $1.25 a day for service in foreign countries and the settlement was made in 1924 or 1925, and then because it was not at the end of the war but 7 years later, 25 percent was added to the adjusted compensation, and then this sum was invested in a 20-year endowment policy due 20 years after it was taken out?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Kentucky 5 additional minutes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I see my friend's point.

Mr. BIERMANN. Let me finish my question.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman has several questions in his statement and let me answer them.

There are two arguments about the 25 percent. One is that it covers 6 years' deferred payment, but the weight of authority is, and my friend, I think, is a very good lawyer——

Mr. BIERMANN. No; we have plenty of lawyers here, but I am not one of them.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I am sorry. The weight of authority is that the 25 percent is for the 20-year deferment.

THE CERTIFICATES ARE NOT A SINGLE-PREMIUM INSURANCE POLICY

Let me tell you about the endowment policy. This is not a single-premium endowment policy, and that brings up a very interesting development. It has been said again and again and again that this is a single-premium endowment policy. It is not. It is not a single-premium endowment policy. If it had been on January 1, 1945, according to the Veterans' Administration figures, there would be in the adjusted-service-certificate funds two and a half billion dollars, instead of one and a half billion dollars. In other words, if the single-payment-premium plan had been followed, there would be no necessity for any immediate cash outlay under this bill at all. The money for it would be in the fund.

Instead of the single premium payment, what have they done? They have been paying annually into the fund, making annual appropriations. Many times there has been a failure to pay that which should have been paid in order to keep the fund intact, and today, under the plan adopted, they admit there is a deficit of $60,000,000; and, further, the Veterans' Administration admits that if you continue the $112,000,000 annual payments—even though you make up the deficit of $60,000,000 as of January 1, 1936—there is going to be a further deficit of almost $300,000,000 on January 1, 1945.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. In further answer to the gentleman from Iowa, it must be borne in mind that when we were discharged we were given a $60 bonus. This, as I understood it, was so that the men going back into civilian life could buy civilian clothes. This was generally understood by the man who was discharged. However, they deducted that from the bonus, and that must be borne in mind in connection with the 25 percent.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. May I remind the gentleman that on January 28, 1931, Mr. Mellon and Mr. Mills were testifying before the Senate Finance Committee on this question, and they admitted that the 25 percent was not interest from 1918 to 1925 but was for deferred payment or for waiting 20 years, from 1925 to 1945. This is in the printed hearings of the Senate Finance Committee and may be found on pages 62 and 63 of those hearings.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There is no question but that your statement is correct.

Mr. DONDERO. In other words, the situation is this: The interest to which the veterans would be entitled from the time of their discharge up to 1925 would offset what they would get from now to 1945.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. In conclusion, I want to express my appreciation for the splendid cooperation we have received from the members of the Committee on Ways and Means. They, at all times, have been very considerate of the veterans' interests. Particularly do I want to thank our chairman, Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON, who has been of most valuable assistance in the preparation of the bill and its expeditious consideration. The veterans of this country are indebted much to Speaker BYRNS for his friendly cooperation—a highly important service—in our arriving at "a united front." Also, we must not overlook the friendly attitude of the important Committee on Rules, which has enabled the bill to come up at this time. The committee appointed by the Patman conference, composed of Congressmen COLMER, chairman, of Mississippi; CONNERY, of Massachusetts; HANCOCK of North Carolina; DIES, of Texas; SCRUGHAM, of Nevada; and BERLIN, of Pennsylvania, assisted materially in enabling this measure to come to the floor of the House with a united front, and their efforts in this respect is appreciated.

Let me say this last word: Let us stand together—with united front. Let us avoid confusing the issue. Let us send this bill to the Senate with an overwhelming vote. [Applause.]

We desire to present a succinct statement of the history of the adjusted-service certificates, together with a short explanation of the bill by sections. We believe that this information is fully and briefly, as well as clearly, explained in the report of the committee, and we include herewith the language of the report:

HISTORY OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Almost 100 bills and resolutions were presented in the Sixty-sixth Congress to adjust the pay of the World War veterans. This was the Congress that began on March 4, 1919—the first Congress to convene after the World War.

On May 21, 1920, a bill was reported from the Committee on Ways and Means providing for adjusted-service pay, adjusted-service certificates, vocational-training aid, farm or home aid, and land-settlement aid. Quoting the Honorable Henry T. Rainey, late Speaker of the House of Representatives and then a distinguished member of this committee:

"It would seem that the insurance features of the bill, which have never been requested by any soldiers' organization in existence today, could with propriety have been left out of this bill."

This was the first adjusted-compensation measure. It passed the House May 29, 1920, by a vote of 289 to 92. It was reported from the Finance Committee, but was not brought up for action in the Senate, and failed with the adjournment of the Sixty-sixth Congress.

In the Sixty-seventh Congress numerous bills to provide adjusted compensation for the World War veterans were introduced. H. R. 1, in that Congress, was very similar to the bill which had been reported out of the committee in the previous Congress. On March 13, 1922, an adjusted-compensation bill was reported to the House by Mr. Fordney, then chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. It had the fivefold plans of compensation—adjusted-service pay, adjusted-service certificates, vocational-training aid, farm or home aid, and land-settlement aid.

This measure, as did the one previously reported, arrived at the adjusted-service credit with adjusted pay of $1 for each day of home service and adjusted pay of $1.25 for each day of oversea service with an outside limit of $500 and $625, respectively.

The adjusted-service certificate would have a face value equal to the sum of the adjusted-service credit increased by 25 percent, plus interest thereon for 20 years at the rate of 4½ percent per annum, compounded annually (such value being approximately equal to 3.015 times the adjusted-service credit of the veteran). The certificate was to be dated October 1, 1922, and payable 20 years thereafter.

The minority report as filed contained the following language:

"We believe and insist that the amount of money, bonus, or service credit which Congress concludes is justly due the veteran should be paid in cash, on demand, and we protest against the veteran being given, as is provided by the pending bill, a 20-year due bill or, as the Comptroller of the Currency calls it, a 'rain check.'

"If the Government justly owes the veteran an additional compensation, as the bill admits, why should it not treat him as it does its other current creditors—pay him on demand in cash?

"The due bill, rain check, borrowed-money bonus mode of payment is an insult to the World War veteran and a shameful discredit to the Congress and the Nation."

This measure passed the Congress, was vetoed by the President, passed the House over Presidential veto, but failed of passage in the Senate over the veto.

In the Sixty-eighth Congress, on March 17, 1924, the Honorable William R. Green, then chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, reported H. R. 7959, the adjusted-compensation bill, which was enacted into law. It fixed the adjusted-service credit, as did the former bills, at $1 per day for each day of home service and $1.25 per day for each day of oversea service, not to exceed, however, in any case $500 for home service or $625 for oversea service.

Under that act the veteran received the equivalent of a paid-up 20-year endowment policy for the amount which his adjusted-service credit, plus 25 percent, would purchase at his age. Such insurance to be computed in accordance with the accepted actuarial principles and based upon American experience tables of mortality, with interest at 4 percent per annum, compounded annually. A sinking fund was created by the act sufficient to extinguish all claims of every character. This fund to be used, first, to pay death losses as they occurred, and, second, the surplus to be invested to provide for payment of the remaining certificates on maturity.

During the Sixty-ninth Congress H. R. 16886 was enacted authorizing the Director of the Veterans' Administration to make loans to veterans up to 50 percent of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates. Congress also enacted laws reducing interest charges on such loans, first reducing same to 4 percent and later reducing interest charges to 3½ percent. All interest is being compounded annually.

In the Seventy-second Congress H. R. 7726 was adversely reported by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives. H. R. 1 likewise received an adverse report from the committee. The consideration was had after the Rules Committee was discharged by way of petition from the consideration of the bill. The Owen amendment was adopted, and the bill passed the House by a vote of 211 to 176 on June 15, 1932. The bill was brought up in the Senate on June 17, 1932, and was defeated by a vote of 62 to 18.

In the next Congress, the Seventy-third, the Ways and Means Committee took no action on the cash-payment bills. Upon petition filed by Mr. LUNDEEN, of Minnesota, it was discharged from consideration of H. R. 1, which passed the House on the 12th day of March 1934 by a vote of 295 to 125.

The Finance Committee of the Senate reported this bill unfavorably, and no vote was taken on it.

In the first session of the present Congress the provisions of H. R. 1 were substituted on March 22, 1935, for the provisions of H. R. 3896 by a vote of 207 to 204, and were passed by the House by a vote of 319 to 90. The bill was passed by the Senate on May 7, 1935, by a vote of 55 to 33. The President on May 22, 1935 (H. Doc. No. 197, 74th Cong., 1st sess.), vetoed the bill. On May 22 the House passed the bill over the President's veto by a vote of 322 to 98, but it failed of passage in the Senate by a vote of 54 to 40.

H. R. 9500 was introduced by me on January 3, 1936, and immediately referred to the Ways and Means Committee.

H. R. 9870, introduced by me with the committee amendments, is a committee modification of bill H. R. 9500. This latter bill, H. R. 9870, was reported to the House on January 7, 1936, by a vote of 24 to 0.

PROVISIONS OF THE BILL BY SECTIONS

SECTION 1. CASH PAYMENT

In this section the adjusted-service certificates are declared immediately payable upon surrender of the certificates and all rights thereunder, with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof. The amount of payment shall be equal to the face value of the certificate subject to any loan that may be made upon the certificate. The payment made, therefore, would be the difference between the face value of the certificate and the principal of any loan made thereon.

SECTION 2. CANCELATION OF INTEREST ON LOANS

Any interest that has been or would be charged against the face value of the certificates either shall be canceled or not so charged. Any interest on any such loan payable to any bank or trust company shall be paid by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

In the case of an unpaid loan held by a bank at the time of filing application for payment the bank holding the note and certificate is to present them to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for payment of the bank's claim on the loan, but interest will not be paid beyond the forty-fifth day after mailing of notice to the banks to present the note for payment.

SECTION 3. APPLICATION AND PAYMENTS

This section provides that applications for payments may be made and filed either personally by the veteran, or in case of physical or mental incapacitation, by the proper representative of the veteran.

If the veteran dies after application is made and before it is filed, it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made, it shall be valid if it bears the bona-fide signature of the applicant, discloses the intention to claim the benefits of this act, and is filed before the maturity of the certificate. If the death occurs after the application is filed but before the receipt of the payment, or if the application is filed after the death occurs but before mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran irrespective of any beneficiary designation.

Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application has been filed before the maturity of the certificate and, for any reason, the application cannot be found, such application shall be presumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when the application was filed.

If application for payment of a certificate is filed before April 6, 1937, payment is to be made upon approval of the application. If application for payment is filed on or after April 6, 1937, payment is to be made on the 1st day of May, September, or January, whichever month first follows the date of filing the application, except that if payment is made to the estate of the veteran pursuant to subection (b), payment shall be made upon approval of the application.

Provides that a veteran who has not heretofore made application for the adjusted-service certificate shall have the right to make such application and to receive either the certificate or cash payment.

SECTION 4. INTEREST ON CERTIFICATES

If a veteran does not file an application for cash payment until on or after April 6, 1937, or does not apply at all before the maturity date of the certificate, he will draw interest on the face value of the certificate (less the unpaid principal of any loan thereon) at the rate of 3 percent per annum from the time of enactment of the act until January 1, 1945, his death, or payment under the act, whichever is the earliest date. The interest is payable upon final payment of the certificate under the act (H. R. 9870) or under the World War Adjusted Compensation Act.

SECTION 5. REDEMPTION OF CERTIFICATES HELD BY THE GOVERNMENT LIFE-INSURANCE FUND

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay off the loans made by the United States Government life-insurance fund upon the security of certificates by issuing to the fund, bonds of the United States, which shall be at least 10-year bonds, but any such bond shall be redeemed by the Secretary and paid to the fund whenever the amount of the bond is required to meet current liabilities.

SECTION 6. FUNDS

Amounts in the adjusted-service-certificate fund are authorized to be appropriated for making payments under the act. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall from time to time advise the Secretary of the Treasury as to the amount of funds necessary to make such payments.

SECTION 7. AUTHORIZATION

This section is the usual authorization for an appropriation for such amounts as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SECTION 8. SEPARABILITY PROVISION

This is the usual separability provision relating to invalidity of a statute.

SECTION 9. SHORT TITLE

This states that this act may be cited as the "Adjusted Compensation Payment Act, 1936."

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, it is too late to discuss the question whether the original issue of adjusted-service certificates was justified, but there is no doubt that these certificates were issued after the introduction of many bills and great discussion, and finally were issued as representing an agreement, a compromise agreement, if you please, but an agreement between the representatives of the Legion and the Congress; and that it was the general understanding at that time that aside from those veterans who were suffering from war-connected disabilities, the question of the bonus was settled. Then, shortly after it was arranged that the veterans could borrow money at certain specified rates of interest on the certificates. Now comes a proposal to pay at their face value these certificates in cash. I think that the suggestion of the committee contained on page 10 of the report can hardly bear examination. That suggestion reads:

Hence the face value of the certificates is an acknowledged debt and obligation of the Federal Government. There is strong sentiment in this country against repudiation of war debts to us. We submit that this debt to war veterans is now due and payable; it is unthinkable to us that it should be repudiated.

That is a bare-faced assumption, because, while this is a debt, it is a debt that is not due for 10 years. I think when anyone gives a note payable in 10 years and the creditor comes at him in a year or two and says, "There is no question that you owe that money, and you have to pay it now", the maker of the note would be justified in objecting to that assumption.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. If the gentleman were to purchase a baby bond, say, in 1936, due in 1946, for which he paid $750, and on which he expects to get $1,000 in 1946, and then in 1946 he looks at his bond and discovers it is not due until 1953 and that 7 years' interest has been ignored, would not the gentleman insist that he get his thousand dollars then and take into consideration that 7 years' ignored interest? That is this proposition exactly.

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. I do not understand that that is the proposition here at all. I think a man is bound by whatever he takes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. I think it is admitted that in the passage of the Adjusted-Service Certificate Act in 1924, effective January 1, 1925, the interest from the close of the war in 1918 to 1925 was ignored and not included in those certificates. It may be argued that the soldier is bound by that law, but why should the soldier be estopped when he had to take this or nothing? It was not what he wanted, but the only thing that he could get, and what we are trying to give him now is justice, and right part of the raw deal given him in 1924.

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. It is fair to assume that Congress well knew in 1924 that the war had been over several years, and the fact of the matter is that the leaders of the American Legion said at that time that that law passed in 1924 settled this thing for all time.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. No more.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. May I suggest to those who are asking the gentleman questions that they read the President's veto message of last May, and they will get their answer there.

Mr. McFARLANE. And by our vote last session he received his answer.

Mr. MERRITT of Connecticut. This proposition to pay these certificates in full comes at a very inopportune time for this country, when there have been enormous deficits and promises of continuing deficits, and although the administration may be reckless in spending money wildly and assuming obligations wildly, it is no excuse for the Congress to add to the embarrassments of the United States by further legislation of this sort.

That, Mr. Chairman, in brief is my whole argument. The question is, What is the obligation of the Government now? And I cannot see that these men who are asking to change that obligation at a time like this have any proper ground, legally or morally, to stand on.

In closing, with reference to the attitude of the men in the American Legion, I read just a sentence from the resolution which was passed by the American Legion at their session in New Orleans in 1922:

The Legion desires to stand not in a position of getting something from the Nation but of giving something to the Nation.

I suggest that the members of the Legion have that in mind now in their attitude toward the United States Government. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW].

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, more than 5 years ago when I entered Congress one of my first official acts was to advocate the cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates to the veterans of the World War. Since that time the need for this legislation has become increasingly greater and all arguments against the cash payment have collapsed.

It must be admitted that during the past several years our Government has made strenuous efforts to restore normal conditions, and while relief has been provided to some extent, and while I hope the foundation for recovery has been laid, the fact remains that there has been very little substantial gain, and what gain we have made is directly due to Government expenditures. Unemployment has not been decreased in proportion to these extraordinary Federal investments.

CASH PAYMENT SHOULD BE GIVEN TRIAL

The program embodying C. W. A., P. W. A., and W. P. A. has called for an expenditure of billions of dollars. Regardless of cost, we have tried almost every scheme that has been suggested. We, who have been advocating the cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates for years, now demand that this, the one sound plan which has a real chance to correct the cause of our trouble, be enacted into law.

We who advocate the cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates do not claim that it is a cure-all for all our troubles, but we are sure it should supplement a comprehensive legislative program embodying the refinancing of farm-mortgage indebtedness, as provided under the Frazier-Lemke bill and a constructive public-works program.

SUPPORTED BY VETERANS' ORGANIZATIONS

The measure under consideration today is supported by all three veterans' organizations, the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Disabled American Veterans of the World War. The measure provides for the cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates. If by chance there are veterans who do not wish to turn in their certificates, they may hold them and interest at the rate of 3 percent will be paid them up to 1945, the date of maturity. Those veterans who wish to cash in their certificates will be paid the face value of their certificates after deducting the amount they may have borrowed. The interest which has not been paid is to be canceled.

BENEFIT TO OUR DISTRICT

Here is what the cash payment of the adjusted compensation will mean to the Third Congressional District of Wisconsin, which I represent. The following amounts of cash will go into the counties of the Third District:

Crawford County	$299,373
Grant County	686,286
Iowa County	357,495
Juneau County	307,989
La Crosse County	971,477
LaFayette County	332,698
Monroe County	512,703
Richland County	348,326
Sauk County	571,415
Vernon County	509,100

Bear in mind that this money will change hands many times in each community and in each county. It would be conservative to multiply these figures by 10 to determine the total benefit each county will receive by the payment of the adjusted compensation.

NO RED TAPE, FAVORITISM, OR GRAFT

Unlike C. W. A., P. W. A., and W. P. A., there is no opportunity for red tape or possible favoritism or graft. In this bill we are distributing purchasing power by paying a debt for services rendered. There is no question as to who will receive the money. It is a program that can be put into effect immediately, and each community will immediately begin to feel the effects of the purchasing power so distributed. It has been estimated that the cash payment will save the Federal Government and the localities more than $900,000,000 in the cost of their outdoor relief.

EVERYONE WILL BENEFIT

The payment of the adjusted compensation will benefit not only the veteran but the entire Nation. It is true, the veteran and his family will receive the benefit of the money first, but that is as it should be, as each veteran earned his share of the adjusted compensation at the risk of his own life in the highest service of his country. He will use the money to pay debts and buy goods. He will buy food, and every farmer will benefit. He will buy other goods, and every merchant will benefit. When goods are consumed, new goods must be manufactured, and men will be reemployed. There are veterans in every nook and corner of the country. To be exact, there are 3,545,284 holders of adjusted-compensation certificates. Of these, 3,019,382 have already borrowed half of the face value of their certificates.

VETERANS UNFAIRLY TREATED

The veteran has been shabbily treated by the last two Congresses. The Seventy-third Congress by the enactment of the un-American so-called Economy Act took away a large portion of what small benefits he was receiving, notwithstanding the fact that the majority of those benefits were paid him by reason of service-connected disabilities. It is true, that a portion of these benefits have since been restored, but only a small portion.

We now have an opportunity of partially making up for this unfair treatment by paying the adjusted compensation to the veterans in time of their need. By using the veteran as the vehicle for the distribution of this much-needed purchasing power, he will again help to save the country from economic ruin, just as he went over the top to save it from physical ruin in 1918.

This is not a measure for the relief of veterans alone. It is a measure for the relief of our entire Nation.

MUNITION MANUFACTURERS PROFITED

The investigation into war profits of the munitions makers shows clearly why they willingly enlisted in the World War. The munitions makers enlisted in return for millions of dollars in profits.

A Government which granted to one individual who faced no danger a profit of millions of dollars cannot refuse to the veterans who faced death itself the payment of their small adjusted compensation and retain any vestige of national honor.

While the munition maker was piling up millions in profits, the soldier in the ranks was exposed to every form of danger and privation conceivable to war-crazed minds. This service he gladly rendered to his country without regard for his personal safety or welfare and all for a salary of $1 per day, most of which went to the support of his dependents. Can there be any justice in now refusing to pay the adjusted compensation to the veteran who served in the ranks? [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. WITHROW. My one remaining thought is this: If our country is going to long endure, if the Government is to remain sound, it must recognize not only its debt to disabled veterans and their dependents, but, likewise, its debt to veterans who are not disabled and who are not dependent. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, as it is with a great many Members of the House, this discussion of the payment of the bonus is an old story in my experience. I make no concealment of the fact that since the first introduction of the so-called "bonus" bill in another body, of which I was then a Member, I think in 1920 or 1921, I have been opposed to the basic theory upon which the whole proposal has been erected. It is not my purpose upon this occasion to discuss the merits or demerits of the bonus as such, but will merely content myself with the statement that I believe it unsound, as I believed it unsound from the beginning. I believed it was going to be bad for the country, and eventually bad for the veterans themselves. I am still of that belief. Perhaps that belief is more thoroughly established in my mind when I look at or endeavor to examine the present condition of the country. It is from that standpoint, and from that standpoint alone, that I desire to discuss this question today.

We listened to the Budget message the other day, in which the President laid down the financial program of the Government, and made certain estimates and prophecies as to its financial prospects. With the exercise of a great deal of optimism—and I do not criticize him for being optimistic—the President concluded that the regular Budget of the United States Government would be balanced in the fiscal year 1937. He was frank to say, however, that he did not include within his estimates of governmental expenditures anything for relief. He left that item unestimated, unguessed at. That it will be a very, very large item everyone knows, and if we are estimating the condition of the Government a year from now, granted that we are going to balance the regular Budget, which, incidentally, I very much doubt, it is perfectly evident that when we have finished making appropriations for relief the Budget as a whole will be desperately out of balance. The out-of-balance figure may not be quite as large as it has been this year, but nevertheless it will be of staggering proportions. Since the Budget message was read and those estimates were given to us and to the country a dramatic event has occurred. I refer to the decision of the United States Supreme Court with reference to the A. A. A.

I am not going to discuss the merits or demerits of that decision, but merely to call your attention to the fact that as a result of it a very substantial additional burden must be placed upon the United States Treasury. We understand that the President, according to press despatches, has given assurance that the contracts which the A. A. A. authorities have made with farmers, and which are now in existence, must be fulfilled. In other words, that the money which the Government has promised to pay farmers will be paid. I have made diligent inquiry in the short time which has elapsed since the decision to find out how many millions that will involve.

I have heard it estimated all the way from $200,000,000 to $600,000,000. What the true figure will be I do not know, but that it will be in the hundreds of millions there can be no doubt. I am one of those who regard $100,000,000 as somewhat important, although perhaps I am out of fashion in this regard. Whatever the sum, it must come out of the United States Treasury directly. No longer can it be raised by a processing tax. So, since the Budget message was received, an additional burden has been placed upon the United States Treasury unlooked for at the time of the reading of the message. In other words, the Budget estimate has got to be revised. I do not mean to use exaggerated expressions, but in some respects it is not today worth the paper it is written on. It must be rewritten and reestimated; and I have no doubt in due time the Director of the Budget or the President will inform us as to the additional obligations which must be shouldered and carried by the Treasury of the United States. Now, this is serious enough, at least it is serious enough to those of us who believe that if we are to escape ultimate inflation of one sort or another, be it credit inflation or currency inflation, one of the things which must be done is to balance the Federal Budget. At best it cannot be balanced short of 18 months or 2 years, and every one of us knows that every month that goes by with it out of balance increases the danger of financial collapse. It is not a partisan question at all; it is a great public question. If we reduced our expenditures drastically this very day, we still would have a huge task in front of us to straighten out the finances of the Government in such fashion as to avoid the pitfalls and dangers which come from a continuation indefinitely of the piling up of deficits and debts. Now comes this bill.

The gentleman in charge of the bill assures us that it will not cost at the outset more than $1,000,000,000. He has not vouchsafed to tell us, nor has the committee vouchsafed to tell us where the $1,000,000,000 is to come from. I do not know where it is to come from. I have heard various suggestions, as all of you have, that it might be taken from the $4,000,000,000 appropriation, but that seems to have been negatived; that these certificates might be paid by the issuance of currency, which I assume the administration has the power to issue. Another basis suggested for the raising of funds is the issuance of bonds; in other words, by borrowing. However this sum is to be paid, it is $1,000,000,000, perhaps more; and it is going to impose upon the financial structure of this Government and of this country a tremendous burden on top of the burden inadvertently imposed upon the country and the Treasury by the collapse of the A. A. A. processing tax.

The President in his message transmitting the Budget, as I recall it, or perhaps it was in his speech at the convening of the Congress, stated that no new taxes would be necessary if existing laws were left undisturbed; but he certainly conveyed the very clear impression that if any additional financial burdens were placed upon the Treasury as the result of changes in existing laws that he would demand that tax measures be passed to meet the additional expenditures.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I assume this bill is going to pass by a very, very large majority. I shall vote against it, futilely, I suppose. I assume it will pass another body by a very, very large majority. If the President vetoes it, as is confidently expected, I understand that it can and will be passed by both Houses over the veto. Thus $1,000,000,000 additional obligation is to be placed upon the Treasury of the United States in some form, and whatever its form it will be a burden, because money does not drop from the skies, and you do not pick it up on the street more than once in a lifetime. The $1,000,000,000, Mr. Chairman, is to be paid out by the Government; and the Government will either print it, borrow it, or take it from the people's earnings in the form of a tax.

This is a matter which in my humble judgment must be considered very, very seriously. Can we at this time, no matter how good our intentions, no matter how meritorious some of these measures may seem, can we at this time pile upon the Federal Treasury an additional burden of such huge dimensions and postpone, I may say almost indefinitely, the balancing of the Federal Budget?

I wonder, Mr. Chairman, how long our economic system, how long the confidence of the country, can be maintained. How long can our economic system last if we persist in piling additional burdens upon the Treasury, thus postponing indefinitely the wiping out of the annual deficits? I have tried to read the history or story of other countries who have gotten themselves in financial difficulties finally resulting in complete collapse of their currencies.

I would not be a prophet of evil or a pessimist; but, Mr. Chairman, there are signs in this country today which indicate that we are in the initial stages of inflation—credit inflation, perhaps. I am not an economist, and do not speak with authority; but, frankly, I am deeply disturbed by certain developments. The way to stop this and save us from the catastrophe which will surely overtake us if we go on with these new expenditures and the undertaking of these enormous obligations is to balance the Federal Budget just as soon as we can. I think the President must have had that in mind when he inserted the sentence in his message to the effect that the Treasury cannot endure much more borrowing without taxes being imposed. If we impose taxes much heavier than the people are today carrying, both Federal, State, and local, we shall put an impediment in the path of recovery more effective than any other obstacle we could raise.

I know it is not conducive to oratory to discuss the dollars-and-cents side of government. I know that audiences do not become excited and demonstrative; but, Mr. Chairman, the dollars-and-cents side of government is about the most important side of government, and it is a grim problem at this hour. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the Ways and Means Committee upon reporting this bill, which is to provide for the immediate payment of the World War adjusted-service certificates, sometimes known as the "bonus", and I also commend the leadership of the House for permitting the measure to be brought up for consideration thus early in this session of Congress.

It is needless to say that I shall most heartily support this bill, since I have consistently and upon every occasion voted for all legislation designed to accomplish this purpose.

When the present Adjusted-Compensation Act was passed in 1924 I voted for the bill, and also voted to pass it over President Coolidge's veto, but I also voted at that time for an amendment, which was defeated, which would have authorized the payment of the adjusted compensation in cash. The 1924 act was a compromise and was the best that could be secured at that time.

To my mind, the veterans of the World War are entitled to this compensation, since the payment for services which they received as soldiers was grossly inadequate as compared with that received by those in civilian employment, and the object of the Adjusted Compensation Act was in some measure to adjust the compensation received by the veterans with that received by persons not in the service.

Believing that it is a just debt due from the Government of the United States to the defenders of our flag in the World War, I have upon every occasion when opportunity was afforded voted to pay the veterans this sum, and not defer it until some later day.

Payment at this time will, therefore, discharge a debt which the Government owes the World War veterans. The veterans of the World War are greatly in need of the sums due them at this time, and I am convinced that the payment now will be of immense benefit to the veterans throughout the country.

Furthermore the payment at this time will not only be a benefit to the veterans but will increase the purchasing power of the country and put into circulation a sum of money which will facilitate the recovery from the depression.

Large sums of money have been expended by the Government to aid the needy and restore the purchasing power of the people, but this payment will not only accomplish this purpose but will at the same time discharge a debt due from the Government and equitably distribute the payment thereof throughout all the States.

Other forms of relief have been criticized because the payments have not been equitably distributed through the various sections of the country, but this bill will not be subject to this objection. As illustrative of the increased purchasing power that the payment of these adjusted-service certificates will accomplish, I cite the figures as to the payments which the veterans will receive in the eight counties comprising the Sixth Congressional District of Texas which I represent, which are as follows:

Brazos County	$322,677.63
Ellis County	797,066.21
Freestone County	333,820.25

Hill County	$635,986.01
Leon County	294,052.65
Limestone County	583,686.67
Navarro County	894,172.45
Robertson County	402,552.72
Total	4,264,014.59

All of the other congressional districts in the United States will receive payments in proportion to the population of the veterans residing therein.

It is gratifying to know that the sponsors of the different bills and the various organizations favoring this legislation have adjusted their differences and are all supporting this bill, which should insure its immediate passage.

In this connection I cannot refrain from commending my colleague, Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas, for the long and faithful fight which he has made in behalf of this legislation.

It is my fervent hope that the bill may not only pass the House but will soon be enacted into law, so that delayed justice may be done to the veterans and at the same time that the country may be benefited by increased purchasing power.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

LET US PAY THESE CERTIFICATES IN GOLD

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the able gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] speaking of balancing the Budget.

To my certain knowledge the National Budget has not been balanced in 10 years; but even if it had been balanced, that prosperity to which the gentleman refers, and to which his party harkens back during the late twenties, was a prosperity in name only. The toiling masses of this country—the farmers, the men who produce the raw materials that feed and clothe the world—never had their budgets balanced during those years. So, when we talk of balancing the Budget, Mr. Chairman, we should take into consideration the budgets, the welfare of those people who really pay all the running expenses of the Federal Government, the State governments, and all local governments.

The gentleman from New York talks about a collapse of our financial structure. I stated years ago, and I say it today, that if we continue to attempt to run this Government and balance the Budget on the present price levels, we will probably have worse than a collapse of our financial structure. We will likely come to the time when the American people will be unable to meet their obligations and pay the debts of this country on the present price levels. Then we may witness the terrible spectacle of wholesale repudiation.

I stated on the floor of this House many years ago that there were only two ways out of our difficulties. One of them lay in a liberal, controlled expansion of currency, and the other one in a reduction of our debts of all kinds, scaling them down and reducing the interest rates. I stand by that statement today.

This bill does not pay the bonus; it merely authorizes it. If no other legislation is passed, they will never get a dollar. Some means of payment must be provided.

Mr. Chairman, I am an old hand in this fight. I appeared before the Ways and Means Committee in 1924 and urged them to pay these adjusted-service certificates in cash at that time. They could have been paid by the expenditure of a little more than $1,400,000,000, and all this interest rake-off that has been going to financial institutions would have been saved, either to the Government or to the soldiers.

I shall support this measure, but I am sorely disappointed that there has been stricken from the bill the only sane method of payment that has ever been advocated, and that is by means of a liberal, controlled expansion of the currency which would have put to work some of the gold that we now have piled up in the Federal Treasury. You say you are afraid that will start inflation. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is the only one I have heard say he is afraid of an expansion of credit. The rest of them seem to be afraid of expansion of currency.

Let us pay these certificates in gold.

We have at the present time $10,000,000,000 in gold and $1,000,000,000 in silver, with a circulating medium of only about five and one-half billion dollars, including a great deal of money that is lost or unaccounted for.

If you are afraid of uncontrolled expansion I will tell you how to pay the adjusted-service certificates without uncontrolled expansion, or inflation. Let us coin this gold and silver and pay the veterans off in gold and silver. Then we will not have to levy taxes. Then there will be no danger of going into uncontrolled inflation, but we will be paying them out of wealth we now have in the Treasury and which at the present time is doing us no good.

Of course, it would be the same thing if we just set aside that amount of gold and silver and issue United States gold notes or silver certificates against that gold and silver, but that does not please those people who have their money invested in tax-exempt securities and who want their pound of flesh. That does not please the Wall Street banker who is looking forward to the interest he will get out of the bonds which will be floated to meet this obligation. They will get no rake-off if we pay these certificates in this way.

I have pointed out before that in 1914 we had about $35 per capita in circulation. The price levels were down at the time. From 1914 to 1920 we raised that to $53 per capita and commodity prices went up. On that price level we incurred these debts. Now we are asking the people to pay those debts on existing price levels. It cannot be done. You may pay these certificates in the way I am explaining to you. If the gold is coined down to $5 and the rest of it in silver, how can you "hard money" Members on the Republican side object?

That could not result in uncontrolled inflation. What is this gold and silver supposed to be for? Why, to be coined into money. We need the money, and we have the surplus gold and silver. Let us coin it and pay this debt. Put this new gold and silver money in the hands of these veterans in every precinct in the United States and this country will leap forward into the greatest era of prosperity you and I have ever seen.

You "hard money" Democrats, how can you object to that? You are going to be called upon here to raise taxes, and to tax until it hurts, unless you do put this surplus gold and silver to work. How can you object to coining this gold and silver and paying these certificates in that way? You are going to vote for paying them, and it is your duty to provide the means to pay them. This is the method that should be pursued.

Besides, you "sound money" fellows cannot call the issuance of gold and silver dollars "wild inflation", and nothing in God's world would do more to stimulate the American people, to bring back real prosperity, to bring back a satisfied state of mind, than to coin $2,200,000,000 worth of gold and silver money out of the gold and silver we now have, and pay it to these soldiers in every nook and corner of the United States.

I say it would do more to bring back prosperity than any other one thing you can do. It would stimulate business, start the wheels of industry, raise the price of wheat and corn and hogs and cotton and land and lumber, and bring back prosperity to all the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

CANCELATION AND REFUND OF INTEREST

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, the question of refund of interest was mentioned in connection with this bill. In order that there may be a fair understanding of this question I want to go back and explain it a little more fully than it has been explained here this morning.

These certificates were delivered to the veterans January 1, 1925. Two years later they could borrow a small sum. On a thousand-dollar certificate they could go to a bank and borrow $88.15. They paid 2 percent above the rediscount rate on 90-day commercial paper in the Federal Reserve district in which the bank was located. This resulted in the veteran paying 6-, 7-, and 8-percent interest compounded annually. Each year the veteran could go to a bank and borrow an additional sum. In 1928 he could borrow an additional twenty-eight dollars and some odd cents on a $1,000 certificate, and in 1929 twenty-seven dollars and some odd cents. It was reduced each year; but in 1931 a law was passed which permitted a veteran to borrow 50 percent of the face value of his certificate.

Six out of every seven veterans who hold these certificates have borrowed the limit allowed by law and have not paid the interest on these loans. The Veterans' Administration has never notified them to pay the interest, the banks have never notified them to pay the interest, therefore the interest has remained practically unpaid since that time and has been accumulating. Now, before the 50 percent loan law was passed, millions of loans were made to veterans. They would borrow $80 or $100 and then go back and pay it, or pay the interest, and later on they would go back and borrow some more money. If they paid the interest it would not be refunded under this bill. If the interest accumulated it will be canceled under this bill.

We will suppose veteran A, who received a $1,000 certificate, borrowed $87.99 on it from a bank January 1, 1927. January 1, 1928, he renewed his loan by having the accumulated interest of $5.28 added to the principal and obtained an additional loan of $26.79. On January 1, 1929, 1930, and 1931 he did the same thing. Each time renewing his loan, having the interest added to the principal and getting a small additional loan, but the limit permitted by law. March 1, 1931, he borrowed the limit, which was up to 50 percent of the face value of his certificate, $271.99. After all prior loans and accrued interest had been deducted veteran A's certicate is then transferred to the Government, where it is now held, the Government paying the debt and interest.

Under this bill, if it becomes a law, these interest payments will not be deducted, because they present accrued interest and not interest paid.

When these loans were first authorized in 1927, there were 25,000 banks in this Nation. Today there are only about 14,000. Eleven thousand banks have gone out of existence. Many of the banks having these small loans, with small amounts of interest involved, have gone out of business, and if we were to attempt to refund this interest at all we would have to refund it to all of them and if we attempt to refund it to all of them, it would require such cumbersome administration that the cost to the Government, I predict, would be more than the veterans themselves would get in return.

Therefore I shall not oppose the committee's action in striking out this provision with respect to refund of interest paid. The cancelation of accrued interest remains in the bill. It is a small amount that is involved, and I think the veterans would be satisfied if this bill remained just exactly as it is.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I have only a very short time, but I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The gentleman has said that it would be a small amount. I wonder if the gentleman has any exact figures on that?

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] estimates it between six and seven million dollars. I am sure it is less than $10,000,000. It is a comparatively small amount.

It is undisputed by anyone that the veterans were not allowed 7 years' interest from 1918 to 1925. No one can consistently or truthfully say that that interest was allowed. So in asking for the passage of this legislation you are merely asking the Government to go back and redate these adjusted certificates to the time they rendered the service and give them a reasonable rate of interest.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BIERMANN. Does the gentleman say that when the war was over these men were entitled to the face of the adjusted certificates?

Mr. PATMAN. No; I did not say that. I hope the gentleman will not take up my time.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman has had considerable time over the radio, in extension of remarks, and on the floor.

Mr. PATMAN. I would be glad to answer the gentleman's questions if I had time. I say that they, the private soldiers, had due them a dollar a day after the war was over.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. BIERMANN. None of these men who went overseas received as little as a dollar a day. Not one American soldier was overseas at as little as a dollar a day.

Mr. PATMAN. They received $1.10 a day for overseas service.

Mr. BIERMANN. The buck private.

Mr. PATMAN. Most of them were buck privates, few of them were officers.

Mr. BIERMANN. Fewer than half of them got as low as $1.10 a day.

Mr. PATMAN. On an average it was a dollar a day on this side and $1.10 a day for the foreign service.

Mr. BIERMANN. On an average? Then some must have got less.

Mr. PATMAN. The buck privates constituted the average.

Mr. BIERMANN. No; they did not.

Mr. PATMAN. They represent most of the veterans, very few of them were officers.

Mr. BIERMANN. But many of them were something above buck privates. I have heard the gentleman say in his addresses——

Mr. PATMAN. Oh, I cannot allow the gentleman to take up all of my time, as much as I like the gentleman. Anyway, the veteran has borrowed his own money, and he contracted to give as much as 6- and 7- and 8-percent interest, compound, for that money. That interest goes into principal, and they are now paying interest on that, and if this debt is not paid now, by 1945 practically all the remainder will be consumed by the payment of compound interest to the banks and to the Government. In other words, the banks and the Government will get one-half the certificate and the veteran will get one-half unless this debt is liquidated now in the manner we want it liquidated.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I am sorry; I have not the time.

I want to say just a word or two about this Budget. When war was declared, tax measures were passed. I mean after the declaration of war these tax measures were passed; and if they had continued in effect, if the tax-reduction bills for the big corporations had not been passed immediately after March 4, 1921, the Government would have collected sufficient money to have entirely liquidated the national debt by June 30, 1927. We had a law that would have captured the profits of the war; to pay for that war. When the other party came into power on March 4, 1921, they commenced to reduce the taxes on those war profiteers and allowed them to escape that taxation and caused us to have this enormous war debt on our shoulders which we have today. Had they not been trying to protect the big interests and the war profiteers, this national debt would have been paid long ago and this Budget would have probably been balanced. [Applause.]

LAWS TO TAKE PROFITS OUT OF LAST WAR REPEALED WHEN WAR OVER

At my request, Mr. L. H. Parker, Chief of Staff, Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, prepared a statement for me which shows the amount of money that would have been collected and the time that the war debt would have been paid off had the wartime taxes remained in effect. The table is as follows:

DIVIDENDS ON CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS

This table discloses that we had laws during the World War that would have made those who profited most by the war pay the cost of the war. If these laws had remained in effect, the entire national debt would have been paid by June 30, 1927, and the Treasury would have had a balance of a billion and a half dollars. Instead, however, the Republicans were determined to reduce the taxes on the big corporations. Evidently, these large concerns had made big contributions to the Republican campaign fund and the Republican Party was under obligations to them. This is the danger of any political party receiving its money from so few people. It is much better that the party be supported by a large number, small amounts from each.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, where will you get the money?

A bill proposing to pay the adjusted-service certificates to World War veterans, due in 1945, is again before the Congress for consideration. We are being asked by certain veteran and other groups to pass a bill to authorize the payment of these certificates now, and without making any provision for the money with which to pay them. Should the bill become law, approximately $2,000,000,000 of the taxpayers' money would be required to pay these certificates, and at a time when our national debt is the largest at any time in the history of the country. Our national debt has been growing at the rate of more than three billions each of the past 3 years. The importance and far-reaching effect of this bill is therefore obvious and should have the fullest consideration of the Congress.

I am concerned about and have been interested in aiding all veterans who are ill and who were wounded during the World War. I believe it is clearly the duty of the Government to take care of them. They were patriotic, and our Government should assume its responsibility to them. It is a moral obligation.

The question of paying the adjusted-service certificates at this time, however, is a financial matter. Congress passed a law, now on the statute books, authorizing the payment of the certificates in the year 1945. The bill now before Congress proposes the immediate payment of the sum of money due 10 years hence. To anticipate by 10 years the date at which the bonus certificates mature is, in effect, the bestowal upon veterans a gratuity or bounty. Certainly no holder of an endowment policy taken out with a private concern would consider his claim worth as much today as it would be 10 years hence, neither would he assume that the insurance company could pay him now without impairment of its assets. The same principle is applicable to the bonus and the Federal Government. It would be difficult to believe that the majority of able-bodied veterans want to be a favored class of citizens, demanding special gratuities from our Government, and particularly at a time when the Nation is billions of dollars in debt and in the midst of a desperate struggle to emerge from the worst economic depression the world has known.

If this bonus bill becomes law, it will be necessary to either add a large sum to a rapidly mounting national debt or else resort to the printing press. In either case the public would eventually pay the bill. Should the Government borrow two billions or more to pay these certificates now, the taxpayers would be called upon to meet interest charges on the new debt and in which case the public would have to carry the burden. The ex-service men of today and their children of tomorrow would be compelled to shoulder the burden of this stupendous financial debt, and the question is, Will they be able to bear that burden? If they are not, then we will have repudiation, and if we repudiate the debts of this Nation, then we repudiate all obligations. In voting against the bill I am thinking of the interest of all veterans and their families in years to come. In 10 years from now there will probably not be a World War veteran but who will thank me for voting against the bill.

The time has come for financial retrenchment on the part of the Government, and it is imperative that this Congress take cognizance of the unparalleled national debt and give immediate attention to the matter of curtailment in Government expenditures.

Where will you get the money? [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Treasury statement did not say anything about the stabilization fund?

Mr. RICH. I was referring to the devaluation of the gold dollar.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I shall present to the gentleman a daily statement of the United States Treasury, dated January 7, 1936, which shows that exchange stabilization fund is carried in the statement at $1,800,000,000.

Mr. RICH. The statement of the Federal Government charges off $2,000,000,000, and you will find that in the statement of the year we devaluated the gold dollar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes more to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. The Federal Government statement which the gentleman holds in his hand shows that $2,000,000,000 were taken off when we devaluated the gold dollar.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I submit to the gentleman that the stabilization fund——

Mr. RICH. I have answered the gentleman's question. It is not in that statement. I do not yield any further.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. I invite the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is a difference between a life-insurance contract and these adjusted-service certificates. When a man gets a life-insurance contract he enters into that contract voluntarily. The terms and the provisions of the contract are written out and he accepts them and thoroughly understands them. The adjusted-service certificates were not voluntarily taken. The veteran had nothing to do with it. He did not agree to any terms. The Government said, you take it or leave it alone, just as it said they would have to serve.

Mr. RICH. I was not in the Congress at the time that law was passed, but at that time this obligation should have been adjusted and paid; but it was not, and the various veterans' organizations and the Members of Congress at that time agreed that that was the bill they wanted—the bill which should be written on the statute books. Everyone agreed to it. Therefore you have the obligation between the ex-service men and the Members of Congress at that time and the Federal Government. That was the obligation that was due at that time, and it should have been paid then, but it was not; and that is what we are considering today. We are repudiating that obligation that was given to the soldiers at that time and agreed to by the veterans' organizations at that time and by Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. TREADWAY. If the gentleman desires additional time I will be glad to yield him 5 minutes of my time.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, in all probability every Member of the House has made up his or her mind as to how they are going to vote on the final passage of this bill. For that reason my remarks will be brief.

At the outset I want to congratulate the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, and the Disabled American Veterans for uniting behind one bill. The three national commanders, Ray Murphy, of the American Legion; James E. Van Zandt, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars; and M. A. Harlan, of the Disabled American Veterans, and other national officers of these organizations, have shown fine leadership in their willingness and ability to adjust the past differences which have resulted in a lack of unity necessary to obtain the passage of this meritorious legislation. The differences of the past were not as to the objective but to the method to employ to obtain the objective.

I am pleased to be a co-sponsor of this bill with my two distinguished colleagues and friends, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]. Both of my friends and colleagues have fought steadfastly for years to secure the passage of such legislation. The action of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] in joining in a united front assures the passage of the pending bill by an overwhelming vote and its probable enactment into law. During the several conferences which took place, which resulted in unity among the friends of this bill in the House, many Members played an important part therein. They are too many to mention by name. Furthermore, there are many other Members who have fought just as hard for the passage of such legislation, such as we are considering today, who are also entitled to the future appreciation of veterans, their families and friends. However, there is one of our colleagues who played such an important part that I feel warranted in paying him a tribute. I refer to my friend and colleague from Mississippi, Mr. COLMER, who, as chairman of a committee representing Mr. PATMAN and his associates, by his patience and advice, contributed greatly to the present situation where all of the friends and supporters of this legislation are united and not divided.

This subject has been discussed many times, covering a number of years. As a matter of fact, if no debate were permitted, I doubt if there would be a general feeling of disappointment on the part of the membership of the House other than the feeling that debate is necessary in order that the regular parliamentary procedure with reference to the passage of a bill in the House should be complied with.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] and others who have preceded me have ably presented most of the reasons why this bill should be passed. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] has expressed his opinion in opposition, which is his right, an opinion with which I am not in accord, but which I respect. Naturally, as I respect his opinion, although in disagreement, I know that he respects the opinions of his other colleagues who are in disagreement with him.

There seems to be certain pertinent facts, certain outstanding pieces of evidence, compelling in their nature, having in mind that the three outstanding World War veterans' organizations heretofore in dispute, in some respects, have agreed that there is justice in asking for the cash payment of the bonus at this time.

One of our colleagues asked a question of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON]—and it was not in any unfriendly sense—about interest starting from January 1, 1925. If there is a debt, if the membership believes that the veterans who served were entitled to adjusted compensation, then the debt was contracted during the period of service; and if payment was delayed, interest should have started from the time the debt was actually incurred. If there is agreement in your minds in this respect, and if we follow that reasoning and that argument to its final conclusion, the interest should have started from the time when a veteran received his discharge. Of course, that would be a practical impossibility, with approximately 4,000,000 veterans; so a common date must be agreed upon. It seems to me that November 11, 1918, the date when the war in fact stopped, is a proper date from which interest on the debt which the Congress said the Government owed to the veterans should start. If we follow that reasoning, the debt would be paid today in accordance with some computations; but in accordance with the maximum period with reference to the computation of interest, it would be payable on November 11, 1938, at the latest. If that is so, the debt is practically payable today, accepting the argument of those who believe that the 20-year period should have run, and who agree with my argument that interest should start from the date that the debt was contracted.

There is very little difference between this bill and the Steiwer-Byrnes bill. The Steiwer-Byrnes bill brings interest forward to November 11, 1918, and, as a result of computation of interest therein provided, makes the certificates payable in 1937, with a cash surrender value, if their bill became a law at this session, of approximately 98 percent.

The bill now under consideration calls for the immediate cash payment. That is also the primary purpose of the Steiwer-Byrnes bill. The Steiwer-Byrnes bill is a very excellent bill, and if the veteran organizations had united behind that, I would have supported the same. The bill now under consideration differs from the Steiwer-Byrnes bill in that this bill contains a provision that the veterans who do not desire cash payment can hold their certificates and receive interest at the rate of 3 percent, as an inducement for their doing so; and, as the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] has well said, resulting in a reduced demand at this time upon the Treasury in the sum of at least $500,000,000.

There is another major problem that we cannot ignore, at least as the situation presents itself to us. Approximately 3,000,000 veterans have borrowed 50 percent of the face value of their certificates. Interest is running. Let us assume the Congress does nothing between now and 1945. The law, as it exists today, continues during the next 9 years. How much do you think those veterans who borrowed will receive?

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. I am of the belief that what three-quarters of the veterans want is what the gentleman is speaking of at the moment. I am wondering if the gentleman favored a bill which was before the House during the last session which would wipe out the interest?

Mr. McCORMACK. That is not relevant to the bill under discussion today. I do not want to appear by my answer to be discourteous. There is no discourtesy intended, but that is a separate subject in itself. We are fighting for a bill which goes beyond that. Naturally I am practical enough to feel that if we cannot gain the full objective, then we should be willing to take the lesser involved in the greater; but that is not a matter that presents itself today. We are concerned with the greater proposition.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I should like to ask the gentleman, who is one of the sponsors of the bill, if it is not a fact that those who did not cash their certificates will be compensated by the 4-percent interest carried by the certificates they continue to hold?

Mr. McCORMACK. The rate is 3 percent.

Mr. FISH. Then I am in error. That is the first thing. The second thing is my disagreement with the gentleman's committee. The gentleman's committee says that only $1,000,000,000 will be needed to finance this bill. Are not the same percentage of veterans asking for immediate payment of their certificates as borrowed the 50 percent, which is about 80 percent or more of the total number?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Assuming the percentage would be the same, there are 494,000 veterans who have not borrowed anything. Assuming the average value of their certificates at $1,000 makes $500,000,000.

Mr. FISH. As I understand it, about 500,000 veterans who own certificates have not borrowed on them and the gentleman is assuming that these 500,000 will not cash their certificates.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There are approximately 500,000 who have not borrowed.

Mr. FISH. That leaves 3,000,000 who will cash their certificates.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman take that up as one of the authors of the bill? Will he give the House the estimate of the number of veterans who will cash their certificates? I for one am going to vote for this bill, but I say to the members of the committee that $1,000,000,000 is far too low. I think it will be nearer $2,000,000,000.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. There is $500,000,000 in the life-insurance fund. If 500,000 veterans do not borrow on their certificates, these two items will make $1,000,000,000. The cash required is $2,282,000,000. So if you subtract the $1,000,000,000 we have from the $2,282,000,000, it leaves $1,282,000,000; and then there is the sinking fund of $1,500,000,000.

Mr. FISH. Oh, it is going to be taken out of the sinking fund, is it?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That is why it was put there.

Mr. McCORMACK. That is part of the fund, anyway. I do not think there is any argument about that.

Mr. FISH. How will the sinking fund be made available for payment?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is in the form of securities, loans, Government bonds.

Mr. FISH. Was not that money used to pay the 50 percent in cash a few years ago? I am trying to get facts. I am going to vote for the bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. That fund was used to make the 50-percent loans, and in addition the Government insurance fund made loans amounting close to $500,000,000. We are providing a special security in this bill to be given to the Government insurance fund, carrying 4½-percent interest. This fund should be protected because the present law guarantees 4½ percent.

Mr. FISH. You gentlemen framed the bill and ought to know the facts.

Mr. McCORMACK. We did not "frame" the bill; we drafted it.

Mr. FISH. At any rate, it did not come from the White House or the "brain trusters." However, I want to be sure that when the President vetoes this bill, if he does, he will not come down here and say: "You people are all wrong. It will take $2,000,000,000 instead of $1,000,000,000."

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not want to stop my distinguished friend, the gentleman from New York, and I hope he will be the nominee for President on the Republican ticket, but I have only 2 or 3 minutes left, and I want to present one more thought.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. If I understood correctly, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] stated that there was one and one-half billion dollars in the sinking fund.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. One billion four hundred and seventy-one million dollars of assets in the sinking fund as of January 1, 1936.

Mr. FISH. Of course, a billion dollars does not make much difference.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think the remark of the gentleman is rather facetious in view of the fact he said he was going to vote for the bill anyway.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to conclude by trying to finish a thought I was attempting to convey when the various questions were asked. In 1945, if we do nothing more, we are going to have another problem. Do you think that the American people are going to stand having the balance of the veterans' adjusted certificates wiped out by interest? Do you think any American Congress will stand for that? Do you not think that in 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944, or 1945, or in any event if nothing is done until 1945, that an aroused public opinion, and an aroused feeling in the Congress which will exist at that time, whether we are here or not, will demand and secure the passage of legislation that will bring about cancelation of the interest? Common sense tells us that the American people are not going to let the balances of these adjusted-service certificates be wiped out by interest.

Payment at this time will assist business recovery. I am not going to say it will alone bring about recovery of business, but with other factors that exist at this time it will go to play an important part in business recovery. In addition to that, by passing this bill at the present time we are solving the interest problem which is going to stare Congress in the face during the next 9 years unless something is done along these lines. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. When the bonus bill was up at the last session of Congress, I was somewhat embarrassed to find the American Legion fighting for one bill and the Veterans of Foreign Wars for another. It is most pleasing now to observe the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Disabled American Veterans, all three of these great veterans' organizations of the World War, fighting shoulder to shoulder and urging the passage of

H. R. 9870, the measure now before us. This unanimity of action on the part of the veterans insures success.

What does this measure provide?

First. It authorizes appropriations to provide for the immediate cash payment in full of all of the adjusted-service certificates—bonus.

Second. If any veteran has borrowed any money from the Government on his certificate, the amount he has borrowed on his certificate will be subtracted from the face of his certificate. If any interest has accumulated, the interest due the Government will be canceled. In other words, the veteran will be paid the full face value of his certificate less the amount of money he borrowed from the Government.

Third. If the veteran has borrowed any money from any bank or other institution and has deposited his certificate as collateral, the Government will pay off the amount of his loan and will pay the veteran the difference between his loan and the face of his certificate. If the veteran owes the bank any interest on his loan, the Government will pay this interest, and the veteran will get the full face of his certificate less the amount of his loan.

Fourth. If the veteran has procured no loan on his certificate and does not desire the cash at this time, his certificate will be treated as having matured and he will be paid 3-percent interest on the face of his certificate until such time as he desires to secure the cash on it; but every holder of a certificate will be paid the cash if he desires the cash.

There are three or four important questions, in my opinion, to be determined in voting upon this important measure. In the first place, is this proposal just; in the second place, do the veterans need this relief; and last, is this compensation to the veterans now due?

I was not a Member of Congress at the time, but I never could understand why the Congress of the United States fixed the pay of the World War service men at $1 per day for service in this country and $1.25 per day for service overseas.

At the same time the Government carried on extensive civil works. The workers remained at home and received on an average $10 per day or more with 8 hours' work. Furthermore, during the period of the war and following the war the Government paid a bonus of $20 per month or $240 per year to approximately a million Federal employees. They each received this bonus for 4 years, amounting in all to $960 each. Their average pay was approximately $1,500 per year or $125 per month. They worked 7 hours per day.

The Government took over the railroads. The average pay of the railroad workers was perhaps $8 per day. They were granted an increase. This increase was retroactive for a period of 6 months. Each one of the railroad workers received this bonus of 6 months and many of them received a sum in excess of the soldiers' bonus.

Many persons employed in the coal mines made as much as $30 per day. The average pay of workers who remained at home throughout the Nation averaged approximately $8 per day.

I have never heard any satisfactory reason or justification for requiring the American soldiers and sailors to leave their homes, their families, their friends, their opportunities to acquire an education and their opportunities to enter business, and be subject to the orders of their commanders 24 hours a day and 7 days a week, serving your country and mine at $1 per day on this side and $1.10 across the seas.

As a matter of fact, a million or more of them had to contribute half of their pay to support dependents at home, and used much of the little that remained to buy Government bonds, while tens of thousands of those who remained at home and engaged in industry and other activities accumulated millions of dollars.

Observing this condition when I was a candidate for Congress in 1918, one of the first planks of my platform declared that if I were elected to Congress I would do my part to see that the American soldiers and sailors received more than $1 per day on this side and $1.10 per day for service overseas.

I was elected and became a Member of Congress on March 4, 1919, after the war was over. President Wilson was our Chief Executive, and the Democrats had control of Congress during the war. Before the Democratic Congress went out of power on March 4, 1919, there was passed an act which appropriated $5,000,000,000 to adjust the pay of war contractors. A little later there was an act passed for an adjustment to the railroad owners of this country. This involved about $2,000,000,000. The war minerals relief bill was passed by the Democratic Congress. This adjusted the claims of thousands of persons and concerns and involved many millions of dollars.

The pay of everything and everybody appears to have been adjusted and bonuses paid to almost everybody except the fine group of the flower of the young manhood of America that defended our country most heroically and successfully in those dark days. These young men had been denied the opportunity of pursuing their education work or carrying on any business or taking advantage of the prosperity of those years. They came home and found everything out of joint so far as they were concerned. They found thousands of those who had remained at home in their jobs.

After learning of the billions that had been spent in helping others and of the great fortunes that had been made out of the war and considering the small amount that they had received, it is little wonder that they began to agitate for additional compensation.

When we survey the whole matter dispassionately, is there any fair-minded person who will say that the claim of the veterans is not just? If we had called the money of this contry to the colors as we did the flesh and blood and placed capital on an equality with the young manhood of our country, we would not have had a national debt at the close of the war of nearly $26,000,000,000.

Ever since that war I have strongly favored, in the event of another war, that all of us be required to sacrifice and that money and property be required to sacrifice to the same extent that we require flesh and blood to do so. Take the profits out of war! If this is done, there will be fewer wars. It is not good for our country as a whole for one part of us to have all the patriotism and do all the sacrificing and the other to have the money. Let those who made the profits and did not sacrifice share at least in a measure with those who did offer their lives and sacrificed their opportunities.

Who are the chief objectors to the discharge of this just and honest obligation of the Government? For the most part, it is those who remained at home during the war and piled up their millions in profits. I am happy to say that, so far as I have been able to learn, only one man in my great district has expressed opposition in the last 2 years to this measure. He, too, remained behind the lines and furnished no son to defend our country.

Was it unusual for these young men to return to their homes and, in tens of thousands of instances, find those who remained at home in their jobs, and to find themselves out of step and out of joint, and learn for the first time the billions that had been made in war profits and the prodigal manner in which the Government had dealt with those who remained at home—for them to ask for additional compensation? The Great War contractors, the railroads, and others had had their matters adjusted and billions had been paid to them. The first measure with the cash payment of this so-called "bonus" came up in the House on May 29, 1920, when I had an opportunity to make my first speech and cast my first vote for the bonus. In doing so I kept my campaign pledge and did what I thought was just and right. This bill passed the House by an overwhelming majority, but no action was taken on it in the Senate. It is unfortunate that favorable action was not had at that time; $1,492,000,000 would have paid it in full—$1 additional for each day of service in this country and $1.25 for each day of service overseas. Other bills were introduced in the House from time to time and passed; some of these passed the Senate and were vetoed, but none of them could be passed over the President's veto.

The veterans were worn out in their efforts and finally in the summer of 1924 the so-called Adjusted Service Act was passed by Congress and vetoed by the President and passed over his veto. It provided that certificates should be issued for this additional compensation, with interest, dating January 1, 1925, and payable January 1, 1945.

Much has been said on the floor and in President Roosevelt's veto message that this money is not due until January 1, 1945. They assert that these certificates are contracts between the Government and the veterans. This is not true. There was no agreement on the part of the veterans to defer the payment of this just claim until January 1, 1945. Congress merely passed the act and forced the veterans to take these certificates instead of cash. The war contractors, the railroads, and others received their adjusted compensation or pay in cash. They were not required to wait until January 1, 1945. What just ground was there to require the veterans to do so? All the bonus means is additional pay for services rendered during the World War. If they were entitled to that additional pay, and undoubtedly they were, it was due when they rendered the service. The armistice was signed on November 11, 1918. This money has been due over 17 years, but the opponents of the veterans would have them wait another 10 years. I insist that this money is now due, and has been due for more than 17 years. I am voting for this bill because this money is now due and, in a small measure, do justice to the defenders of your country and mine in one of the most trying periods in our history. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. The Government has issued its obligations to pay this money. It is now a legal, as well as a moral obligation. We have been spending billions in the last 3 years on "boondoggling" and every other fantastic scheme. When we pay off these certificates we are discharging a legal and moral obligation of the Government.

I am also voting for this measure because it is necessary. Eighty-five percent of the defenders of our country, and their families are now in need, and tens of thousands of them are walking the streets and highways seeking employment that they cannot find. It cannot help our country to have its defenders, their widows and orphans to become common beggars. It has been well said that a nation that will not defend its defenders and protect its protectors will in time be without defenders and protectors. Today we have the threat of communism, the enemies of our Government and the American institutions. What great force in this country can be depended upon more than these same veterans and the Spanish War veterans to combat that threat?

I trust that when I cast my vote for this measure tomorrow it will be the last vote necessary, that it will be passed by the Senate and signed by the President. Of course, if the President vetoes this bill, I shall feel it my duty and it will be a pleasure for me to vote to override his veto as I did at the last session of Congress.

There are intimations in the press that the President will soon call upon Congress to turn over to him an additional $2,000,000,000 to spend as he may desire. We have seen much of the appropriations heretofore turned over to him wasted or used for political purposes, and I trust that the President will not appear before us and veto this soldiers' measure, as he did at the last session, and tell us that there is no difference between those who went and those who stayed at home. There is a vast difference between those who left their homes, their families, and friends and went to camps and battlefields to undergo the hardships and dangers of war from those who stayed at home, and I desire to do what I can to recognize that difference and will cast my vote for this measure tomorrow. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS].

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the Committee, it is very evident from the temper manifested here today that this adjusted-service bill, commonly known as the bonus bill, will pass the House overwhelmingly. I expect to vote for the bill, for I supported the bonus bill in times gone by and have voted to override the President's veto of former similar measures.

There is not much use to consume time in a discussion of the merits of this bill. Every Member of this House has surely made up his own mind as to how he intends to vote. There are many who maintain that the adjusted certificates should not be paid because of the strain upon the Treasury that will result from their payment. That argument was much more potent and forceful in the days when we were trying to live within our means and to pay our obligations when the incomes were falling off because of the depression than there is now when the policy of the Government is to spend lavishly. It would seem to me that so long as the administration spends money with such a reckless abandon there could be no reasonable objection to paying the veterans an obligation which is due them and which they earned in defense of their country.

In the last session of Congress we had a very spirited controversy between the Patman bill and the Vinson bill. At that time I was opposed to the Patman bill because it provided a method of payment which called for the issuance of new money, or what was commonly termed as "printing-press money." I favored the Vinson bill because it provided for the payment of the bonus in regular manner that other Government obligations are paid. I voted for the Vinson bill, but when the Vinson bill failed I then voted for the Patman bill, and I also voted to override the President's veto.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, I participated very actively in the consideration of these two bills and in the preparation of the Vinson bill which our committee recommended in the last session of Congress. The fact that the various contending parties, with reference to these bills in the last session of Congress, have now agreed upon a course has made the work of our committee much easier in this session, and the bill has been recommended for consideration by almost a total vote of this great committee.

There are many who believe that the President will sign the bill, if for no other reason than that he will thereby expect the support of the veterans in his coming campaign for reelection. If the President does approve this measure I cannot see how he possibly can escape the accusation that he was moved to do it for political considerations. In his veto message of the bill passed in the last session, delivered to the House on May 22, 1935, the President expressed his views in language that would, it seems to me, preclude him from signing the bill now under consideration. The President has, on different occasions, changed fronts on important principles and measures. It would appear to me that he will have considerable trouble in squaring himself with his former utterances if he changes front on this measure. For instance in that message he says:

> Why, I ask, should the Congress lift that burden in respect only to those who wore the uniform? Is it not better to treat every able-bodied American alike and to carry out the great relief program adopted by this Congress in a spirit of equality to all?

He further says:

> This bill favors the able-bodied veteran at the expense of the disabled veteran.

Further he says:

> The statement in this same second "whereas" clause that payment will discharge and retire an acknowledged contract obligation of the Government is, I regret to say, not in accordance with the fact. It wholly omits and disregards the fact that this contract obligation is due in 1945 and not today.

The President has on other occasions taken the position that a veteran should be given no preference over the person who did not wear the uniform, and in attempting to maintain that position in his veto message he has the following to say:

> Rightly, we give preferential treatment to those men who were wounded, disabled, or who became ill as a result of war service. Rightly we give care to those who subsequently have become ill. The others—and they represent the great majority—are today in the prime of life, are today in full bodily vigor. They are American citizens who should be accorded equal privileges and equal rights to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—no less and no more.

Further in his message he rises to heights of sublime oratory in an effort to show that it is a question of moral obligation with him and that it would shock his moral convictions greatly to be compelled to sign a bonus bill. In this message he has the following to say in that respect:

> I well realize that some who favor this bill are moved by a true desire to benefit the veterans of the World War and to contribute to the welfare of the Nation. These citizens will, however, realize that I bear an obligation as President and as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy which extends to all groups, to all citizens, to the present and to the future. I cannot be true to the office I hold if I do not weigh the claims of all in the scales of equity. I cannot swerve from this moral obligation.

The President, in his veto message, offers all of the excuses and reasons that he can advance, but we must remember that the President has always been opposed to any and all legislation that is at all favorable to the veteran. He opposed the legislation for restoring the Spanish War veterans to their former pensions, and this was passed regardless of his opposition. Every veteran knows of the President's opposition, and I feel sure that if the President did in this late hour assume a different attitude he would not thereby gain the moral support of the veterans and neither would he gain their political support.

It is my firm conviction that the American people are thoroughly in favor of recognizing the claim of the veterans and that they will welcome the payment of these certificates as provided for in this pending bill.

In 1932 I introduced a bill in Congress providing for the payment of the bonus, and the plan incorporated in my bill was very similar to the plan provided in this bill. My original plan was that those veterans who were able to maintain themselves without cashing their bonus should be encouraged to carry their bonus and would thereby make it easier for the Government to cash the certificates of those who were without work and were in need. My plan provided that all of those who could carry their bonus should be encouraged to do so and should be given some additional advantage by way of interest, and so forth, for their efforts in that respect. My plan further provided that all those who were employed in any public position for the city, county, State, or Nation should be compelled to withhold their applications until their less fortunate comrades had been paid. If my plan had been carried out, the unfortunate veteran would have had his bonus ere this, and the more fortunate would still be carrying his bonus certificate, and the Government would have been able to finance the whole transaction without much of a strain.

The present bill has in it many of the same principles advocated in my bill, for under the terms of the present bill those who have not cashed any portion of their certificates are encouraged to keep them until a later date, or until maturity, and those who have cashed one-half of their certificates are also encouraged to carry the remainder, but those who are in need and are out of employment are given an opportunity to turn in their certificates at once and receive cash for the same. While the strain on the Government will be heavy, this amount can be met by the Government in various ways. For instance, the President can, out of the huge fund which was voted to him in the last session of Congress, easily pay these bonus demands and yet have millions upon millions which he can spend as he has been spending it. And again, the amount of the bonus can be paid from the secret fund of $2,000,000,000 which a former Congress voted to be used by the Secretary of the Treasury as he may see fit, without any report of any kind to the Congress and to the American people. I voted against the allowance of that fund, and I still maintain that it was an un-American program and that this secret fund should be turned into the Treasury and out of it the veterans' bonus can easily be paid. If the administration should fail to pay the bonus in either of these manners above indicated, then there is no reason why the bonus payments should not be made in the regular way by a direct appropriation. The President has already indicated that he expects to ask for additional sums for relief. He does not indicate how much this should be; but in view of the fact that in the last session he asked for and received the huge sum of $4,880,000,000, it is fair to assume that he will ask for another huge allowance equal to and probably more than his prior request.

Summing up the whole argument, therefore, I have to say that if the American people are generally in favor of paying the bonus at this time, and if the American Congress is overwhelmingly in favor of it, the President should not complain if the Congress, as representative of the people, should record its sentiments by passing this bill notwithstanding the President's opposition and his veto.

I feel it my duty to support this measure again as I have supported similar measures in the past. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it is to me a matter of deep regret that I find myself unable to support this bill.

I voted for each of the propositions in favor of the soldiers of this country until the Government expenditures began to exceed its receipts. I voted for the adjusted-compensation certificates, but I cannot vote to pay now the obligation created by these certificates, which mature in 1945, and in taking that position I do not feel that I am voting against the most substantial of all the interest of the ex-service men involved, namely, the stability of their country's credit.

In passing, it may be observed that it is not at all impossible that this bill will prove to be the spearhead behind which will be the mightiest pressure upon the American Treasury ever exerted. I say it is not impossible. It is not even improbable. These are strange times. I will not discuss this bill from the standpoint of what this Government owes these soldiers if it should undertake to pay them in money for their defense of its flag. No one can measure in dollars and cents what it is worth, what ought to be paid to a man hired to go out and face the gas and face the bullets. The ex-service men deserve no such insult as that. You cannot figure that in dollars and cents. There is much said about relief, and so forth. The soldiers of this country do not live off in any province by themselves. They are not aliens. This is their country. They fought to defend it, and they are just as much interested as any other group in America in preserving this country today. If I am correct in my belief, I am not voting against their interest. Let us examine our condition. We talk about appropriating money as if we have some money to appropriate. We get up here and talk about the appropriation of a billion dollars or $2,000,000,000 just as if we had the money to appropriate. We are mortgaging the future.

We have another group of people in this country who have a right to be considered. I refer to the boys and girls who have been coming out of the high schools and the colleges since 1918, who did not have a thing on earth to do with this war. So far as the folks of this generation are concerned, we are engaged in making debts and refusing to pay them in taxes—piling up billions and billions of dollars of debts on these boys and girls, many of whom have no jobs and who have a right to have families and a home and a decent chance to live the same as anybody else. This bill anticipates another addition to our unpaid debts, but there is another consideration of more immediate importance.

We will not go back over the past history very far; it is not necessary. I have not agreed with most of the Members here on the propositions passed before the present administration in regard to establishing agencies by which we tried to borrow ourselves out of debt; but when this administration came into power—and it does not make any difference who was responsible for it—everyone knows that the whole economic structure seemed to be tottering for a fall. I do not charge the Republican Party with the responsibility for that. To change the figure, we had put the ship on the rocks and had to take to the boats. We were all in the same boat. We were really exactly in the situation of a bunch of people in a boat whose ship had been wrecked and were trying to reach land. Everyone was in the same boat—the soldiers, everybody—and that was recognized here, as indicated by the votes cast in this House. There was no division on either side of the line; everyone knew that we were in the same boat; and the thing that stood in the place of or represented the water and food that shipwrecked people attempt to provide themselves with was the credit of the Nation. The question then was, and the question now is, whether that credit will hold out until we can reach shore; until we reach stable economic conditions. I do not think anyone who has any sense will deny that.

We lack over 30 billions of dollars today of having a cent in the Federal Treasury, and that amount is going to increase—and let nobody fool himself about that—in this effort to keep people from starving and to keep things going. That brings us down to this practical question. We have reached the evening mealtime, when all of the people in the open boat are dished out what little they can have, so as to keep everybody living until we can get to shore, and that represents these relief billions, this relief arrangement. I do not believe that these brave boys that fought to defend this country, if they saw this thing as I do, would demand of us that they get a bigger cut, a larger share of the remaining national credit now than all the rest of the people that are in the same boat—the widows and orphans and the generation since 1918. I do not believe it. I do not believe that the thing has been figured quite right to them. I do not believe they understand just the situation that we are in now, and I think we are largely responsible for it. Of course, I may be wrong about this matter, but I do not think so. I have the highest respect for my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] and the rest of the people who do not agree with me. I have learned that when I do not agree with people, somebody is wrong, and that I may be that person; but I have a responsibility in this council of the Nation. I have a duty today. These soldiers were not afraid to become military casualties in the war, and I am not trying to strike any heroic pose when I say that I am perfectly willing to become a political casualty if I feel that I am doing it in the interest of my country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I recognize that this bill will pass with but a few votes against it. It is going to pass the Senate, I understand, and, if not signed by the President, it will pass over the President's veto. My appearing today is not for the purpose of trying to beat this bill, but I am taking advantage of the psychology of this situation to say to my colleagues on this floor that there is a limit to the Nation's credit. We have spent billions of dollars trying to get where we are. There must be a limit. If we keep increasing this deficit, just as certain as the sun rises the time will come when this Government will put out an issue to the people and the issue will not go over, and then the crash will come. There is not a bit of doubt about it. I regret to see this bill here now.

The veterans of this country are as patriotic as any group of people on the face of this earth. I would not say one word to reflect upon the men who followed the flag; but I do not believe this action is to their interest, because their interest is their country's interest, and their country's interest is their interest. I do not think there can be any argument on the point, considering the condition of the Treasury, $2,000,000,000 new burden adds a peril to their country's Treasury; and this example, this two billion draft upon a depleted Treasury, now will make more difficult its protection in the future.

I appreciate the applause I received in the beginning. I am glad I got it then. [Laughter.] I appreciate your attention. I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, 13 years ago the first speech I made on the floor of this House was in favor of the payment of the soldiers' bonus. It is a very happy day for me today to hear my distinguished friend from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] say that the "dope" is, with which I agree, that this bill is going to pass the House, pass the Senate, and if not signed by the President, which I hope it will be, both Houses will override the President's veto. Of course, this bill should have passed long ago.

Now, as to the question of how the bonus should be paid, I understand is to come up at a little later date. I want to take this opportunity, after 13 years here, to congratulate the Veterans of Foreign Wars. The commander, Mr. James Van Zant, is now present in the gallery. I want to congratulate that organization upon the fine spirit that they have shown during this past year. They have fought continually for the Patman bill. Then they went into their national convention and they gave a wonderful reception to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] when he appeared before that convention. Then a little later they voted to support a bonus bill, without regard to how payment should be made. In other words, whether it should be the Patman bill or whether it should be a bond issue or whatever means would be taken by the Congress to pay that bill, the Veterans of Foreign Wars were in favor of the passage of a bonus bill. The national commander of that organization got together with Ray Murphy, national commander of the Legion, and National Commander Harlan of the Disabled American Veterans, and they have cooperated to secure the passage of this legislation. I belong to the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and I was informed a few weeks ago that I am eligible for membership in the Disabled American Veterans organization also; so that I feel very happy at these three great organizations uniting on one bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is the gentleman a member of the Spanish-American War Veterans also?

Mr. CONNERY. I am sorry, but I am not a member of the Spanish-American War Veterans. I am proud to say I am an honorary member of the General Sanger Camp of the Spanish-American War Veterans of Lynn, Mass.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Is the gentleman eligible as an "N. P."?

Mr. CONNERY. I am eligible as a member of the "K. P."—kitchen police—but not as an "N. P."; at least, not up to the present time. [Laughter.]

So I congratulate the national commanders of those organizations and all of the organizations for getting together on this bill. We expect the bill to pass the House by a tremendous majority. We expect it to pass the Senate, and we hope the President will sign it. If he does not, we expect to override his veto.

Of course, I am one of those who went along with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] for the issuance of currency with which to pay this bonus bill. I do not believe in issuing bonds. [Applause.] I believe the American people have been bled to death with bond issues.

I should like to make a suggestion at this time. I should like to suggest something as to what could happen after this bill is passed and becomes a law. Under the rules of the House an appropriation bill will be brought in containing an item for an appropriation to pay this $2,200,000,000. Legislation cannot be offered on an appropriation bill on the floor of the House. A point of order could be raised against such legislation as might be offered to pay the bonus with currency instead of bonds. So I am suggesting to my colleagues on the Democratic side of the House who are interested in the payment by currency and not by bond issue that before the appropriation bill comes on the floor of the House we ask our leaders to hold a caucus, and in that caucus that we should ask that a rule be brought in making it in order to offer the provisions of the Patman bill as an amendment to the appropriation bill, so that currency may be issued to pay the veterans their adjusted-compensation certificates, instead of paying them by a bond issue.

If that could be done, we would have a real vote on the floor of this House, giving all Members an opportunity to vote whether they are in favor of expansion of the currency or whether they are against it. It only requires 25 names to call a caucus. I do not mean that this should be done now. Later, after this bill has become law, I shall start a petition for a caucus for the purpose to which I have referred. I intend to vote for this bill as it is, the bill as we have it here today.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Does not the gentleman understand there has been a gentlemen's agreement between the various groups here, including the so-called leaders of this House, that those of us who favor the Patman bill, will be given an opportunity somewhere down the line to express themselves by a vote, as to what particular method for payment of the bonus they prefer?

Mr. CONNERY. The understanding that I have is that those with whom we conferred would endeavor to obtain that for us, to the best of their ability; but in the event they are not able to obtain that, I suggest that we have a caucus, and in that caucus suggest that a rule be brought in permitting us to offer legislation on the appropriation bill, along the line of the Patman bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Am I correctly informed that at one time there was a provision in this bill which is before the House now to refund the interest that had been paid by men who borrowed on their certificates?

Mr. CONNERY. I shall have to refer the gentleman to the chairman of the committee; I do not know about that.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the gentleman think that is fair?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. That was in the bill I introduced.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will an amendment be offered to restore this provision to the bill?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not know whether one will be offered or not, but I take it the gentleman is in the proper frame of mind to offer one.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does not it penalize the fellow who paid the interest?

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield further, but I may say to the gentleman that that is one meritorious amendment I would accept. I will vote for such an amendment, because I agree with the gentleman. I do not see anything wrong in refunding the interest, especially to men who may have had to scrape to get the money together to keep paying it. If the gentleman will offer that amendment, I will vote for it. I do not think it will hurt the bill in the slightest.

The distinguished gentleman from Kentucky does not think that such an amendment would interfere with the passage of the bill, does he?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I may say to my friend from Massachusetts that this provision was in the bill as originally introduced. It involved, however, as I tried to explain, between $6,500,000 and $7,000,000 to administer, and according to gentlemen representing the Veterans' Bureau it might cost more than that to make a check-up over the country, for thousands of banks have closed, banks in which these transactions were made. I am using the arguments presented against the provision. It is said it would discriminate against men in the same group. In other words, one veteran being able to prove he paid the interest would get the refund, whereas the man living next door unable to prove it would not get it.

Mr. CONNERY. But the gentleman would not undertake to say that such an amendment would interfere with the passage of the bill in either the House or the Senate, would he?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I do not think so.

Mr. CONNERY. That is the way I feel about it also.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I am with him in this proposition. I cannot understand why the Ways and Means Committee ever permitted this provision to be taken out of the bill. It involves only $6,000,000 or $7,000,000. Those who have paid their interest should be compensated. They talk about the immense cost of checking up this information, of the bookkeeping involved. There must be something wrong if the veteran does not know or cannot find out which veterans actually paid and which did not.

Mr. CONNERY. I think in justice it should be paid.

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. HARTLEY. What is to become of the veteran on relief when he is paid the balance due on his certificate? Is he to be dropped from the relief rolls?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. I believe the gentleman from New Jersey will have to address his question to the gentleman from Kentucky or some other member of the committee.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say that this bill is a bill of justice for the veterans of the United States. We know what the profiteers got out of the war, we know how little a private had left of his $30 a month after insurance, Liberty bonds, allotments, and other costs were deducted from his pay in advance. You know that when we went to France those same profiteers who now oppose this bill lined the streets and came down to the docks waving American flags and crying out, "Good-bye boys, good luck, and God bless you; and when you come back nothing will be too good for you." And that is what they gave them when they returned—exactly nothing, even to the extent of trying to take away compensation from wounded, gassed, and helpless disabled veterans. If we want to do justice to the veterans, let us not waste time with months of futile discussion. Let us pass this bill quickly and do belated justice to the men who were willing to sacrifice their lives for the United States of America. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'LEARY].

Mr. O'LEARY. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before the House for consideration, H. R. 9870, soldiers' bonus, provides for the present cash payment of the World War adjusted-service certificates and the unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates. I favor the immediate passage of this bill on the grounds that it is in keeping with the policy of this Government in giving to its citizens a just reward for service; that it is a debt which has been due since the signing of the armistice and is today a bill favored by a majority of the people of the United States irrespective of party ties or service record.

I might state that because of the history of this and similar measures, referring as I do to the number of occasions on which such legislation has been under consideration, that I doubt if it would be possible to add much to what has already been said at one time or another. However, I do feel that no time is more fitting to review some of these arguments and decide, if we can, the proper action of this body to pursue today.

There are outstanding today about 3,550,000 adjusted-service certificates. Their total value amounted to approximately $3,550,000,000 until loans amounting to $1,335,000,000 were made against the face value of these certificates. The present obligation of the Government, or, to state it another way, the present equity of the veterans, amounts to about $2,215,000,000. This is the amount that would be due and subject to payment should this bill be enacted into law, since the interest due on loans would be canceled, leaving the principal intact. However, inasmuch as more than 500,000 veterans have not borrowed on their certificates to date, and for this reason would not be apt to borrow after the passage of this bill, it is safe to assume that its passage will not require the payment of the entire amount of the certificates, since this bill provides for the payment of 3 percent per annum on funds left with the Government. I offer these figures, although there has been some controversy as to just how much money will have to be paid out by the Treasury, because they represent nearly enough the various sums involved and because I will refer to them later in making clear why I favor the passage of this bill. Particularly do I desire that you keep in mind the amount of money that has already been borrowed by the veterans and what the interest on this money will do to reduce the amount of the certificates were they paid in the year 1945.

I mentioned in the beginning that I should like to do some reviewing. I refer to my own record here in Congress, as well as to that of the measure now under consideration.

If nothing else, I hope to be consistent during my tenure of office. When we last voted for the passage of bonus legislation we had before us the Vinson and Patman bills. I first supported the bill introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], because I felt that it had the better chance of being enacted. The President had warned this body in advance that he would veto the Patman bill, and I believed it useless to send this bill to the White House when none of us were sure that it could be passed over such a veto. I do not know if the President would have vetoed the other bill, but certainly it had the better chance. I will state again, just as I stated then, that I am earnestly desirous of seeing this legislation passed, of seeing the veteran paid, and am not merely voting for the bill to save my face with the veterans.

This body subsequently passed the Patman bill, and I am happy to state I voted for this measure. I voted for it again after it had been vetoed by the President and prior to defeat in the Senate. My support of this legislation at all times favored the bill which I believed would ultimately be enacted into law.

I know, just as you gentlemen know, that the Patman bill for the payment of the adjusted-service certificates in new money was being used as a football for the exploitation of personal monetary theories. I do not infer, nor have I ever believed, that this was the reason for its introduction by the gentleman from Texas, but I do know that the failure of the Members of this body, as well as the failure of the American Legion and the Veterans of Foreign Wars, to agree on one of these two bills was one of the reasons for the failure to enact this legislation into law during the last session of Congress. Some who did not approve of paying the bonus were anxious to see the issuance of additional currency. Others were desirous of giving the veteran his due and were not in accord with the theory of inflation represented by the Patman bill. I use the term "inflation" not as my personal viewpoint in the matter, but this was the term which the press and a great many Members of this body used in their discussions. What was the result? We injected a monetary theory in the question of the soldiers' bonus and failed in the mission it was our first duty to accomplish.

The same discord prevailed, to a certain extent, among the people of my own district as well as in other parts of the country. We were all divided on the question of how to pay. I followed the course that I believed had the better chance of accomplishing the purpose of paying the veterans.

I believe that this is enough about what we did and did not do regarding the bonus during the first session of Congress. The question I ask you to ponder over in your minds today is, Are we going to let the veterans down again?

I can state, without fear of contradiction, that the majority of the people in my district favor the passage of this bill. I venture this opinion as strongly as I have made it because I have only to refer to my daily mail or to my association with them since the adjourning of Congress this past summer. Regardless of whatever philosophy of government may govern our own minds on this question, we cannot fail to take into consideration the wishes of the people. And yet I feel that there is even a deeper responsibility in voting on this legislation. It was this body of our Government that voted, back in 1917, to declare war, to send millions of men to their death, sufferings, and hardships that greeted them on the other side, and I think that we are rather tardy in offering to compensate those who in one way or another managed to survive the hell of the other side. Their actions were such that my district can well be proud. They are also demanding that this legislation be passed.

While these men, many of whom were only boys in 1917, were stopping bullets for $30 a month, those who remained at home were earning more than they ever made before or since. I do not propose to return to the people of my district and explain why I failed to vote for justice.

This history of the bonus legislation has been among the major topics of national politics for the past 15 years. I believe that it is time to eliminate this topic from partisan politics and settle the debt by immediate cash payment.

The World War has already cost the United States more than $36,000,000,000. The men in uniform received less than five billions of this, or about one-eighth of the cost of the war. It has been pointed out before that no one can receive this adjusted pay who held rank above captain. Hence it can readily be appreciated that the boys in uniform, 4,000,000 of them, were not responsible for the big cost of the war. Is there anyone here today who believes that the boys in uniform are asking too much when they request an additional $1.25 per day for the time spent overseas and $1 per day for the time spent in service in this country? All of us know that this foreign service involved hardships and dangers that none of us would care to go through for 50 times this amount. It is highly improper to make a financial proposition out of the bonus question. You cannot pay those who never came back. Money will never compensate those who are to spend the remainder of their lives in hospitals which dot the land. Their futures are ruined beyond repair. I submit to you gentlemen: Is it asking too much to offer this assistance to those who survived to live and suffer?

When the veterans returned to these shores following the successful conclusion of the war we greeted them with open arms and promised them the world. Most of these promises, I imagine, were made in earnest. All of us were in a rather jubilant state of mind when peace was declared; the war to end wars was over, and the world was supposedly safe for democracy. How long did it take for us to forget those promises? Well, one of the first things we did, even before the passage of the adjusted-compensation act, was to reward 7,000 war contractors to the extent of a $3,000,000,000 bonus. I refer to the Dent Act passed by Congress. These men worked on a cost-plus plan—the more the Government spent the more they made—and we paid almost $2,000,000,000 to the railroads, who, for the first time in years, showed a very high return on their investments. Too, we loaned the allied Governments something more than $10,000,000,000, about one-third of this being loaned after the war was over, and then adjusted their interest payments over a period of 62 years in such a way as to save them an amount equal to the principal of the loan. It would have saved considerable debate, reams of paper, and untold suffering if the veterans' question of fair compensation could have been settled in this same fashion. Perhaps it would have been were it not for that group who believe that the cause of patriotism was enough for those who fought to save the investments of others who during the fighting continued to make money.

I contend today, gentlemen, that if this Government was in a position to pay $5,000,000,000 to adjust the pay of the war contractors and railroads, that we are in a position to pay the veterans whenever they ask for their money. I contend that if we can pay $10,000,000,000 to allied nations, who have since not only repudiated this obligation but defeated as well the purpose for which the last war was fought, that we can pay the boys who were instrumental in winning the war. In brief, gentlemen, it is beyond my comprehension, considering the facts contained in the records of this body, how we can refuse justice to the veteran today. The means have been found for other things. I know of no reason why they cannot be found for this.

During this session we will no doubt pass legislation to strengthen our national defense. Nothing would stimulate the morale of the Nation more than to prove that patriotism does not always go unrewarded.

In referring to the benefits which this Government has bestowed upon those who remained at home, I can never think of this aspect of the bonus question without thinking also of the difference in conditions which faced these two groups—referring, of course, to those who served in uniform and those who assisted through connections in private business. It is rather absurd to review this part of the question we have under consideration. But to recall a part of it, I remember that during the war every home in America had on the table or wall a map of Europe. We watched, day by day, the reports of how our lines advanced toward the goal set by our military leaders.

For the first time since the beginning of the war our boys made it possible for that line to advance. Wavering sometimes, but always pressing forward. Cannon fire, sprays of hot lead from machine guns, mud, disease, and all it takes to make a living hell, could not stop the American doughboy. He outfought the finest professional soldiers in the world—Germany's pride of the battlefield. While we did without the extra lump of sugar in our morning coffee these boys often went without eating. The shell hole was their bed, the loss of an arm or leg the price paid for gaining a single yard on that long march to victory. Their objective was victory at any cost—and often the price paid was high.

How many of these men came back to start again where they left off? I doubt if any of them did in every respect: A mother dead, a job taken by another, an education out of reach, or other heartaches to greet their return.

These things, gentlemen, cannot be paid for in dollars—nor can they ever be paid for by those of us here. These are the things from which life is made, and, once they are gone, they pass beyond the reach of human hands. What we are trying to do here today is to show some measure of appreciation—not to pay with dollars for the wreckage that can never be salvaged.

This Government has, in many respects, been kind indeed to the soldiers of the war. I believe we have provided the best and most modern hospital facilities in the world for those who were diseased and crippled. We have, until the passage of the economy act, provided, with few exceptions, for the widows of the veterans. We have voted and paid a part of the adjusted-service certificates, and yet, are we to say that this was enough? These favors, if we are to term them such, were the very least that could be done. Aroused public sentiment demanded all of this. Can we point with pride to legislation already enacted, in view of what was paid to groups far less deserving?

Our duty to the veteran today is expressed, as nearly as money can express it, in the terms of this bill. It is neither an adjusted compensation, a bonus, nor a payment in full for the duty performed. Rather it is a token of appreciation of the people from California to Maine, from Canada to Mexico, that the veteran remains high in our esteem, that his service shall not go unrewarded.

I believe I have covered, and I am sure that this has been my aim, most of the reasons why the bonus should have been paid at the close of the war. I do not know why it was not paid; but I do understand to a certain extent why three Presidents, including our present Chief Executive, have seen fit to veto this legislation. I realize that our present national debt is in excess of what it is in normal times. The past several years have been trying times. Prior to these past 3 years, efforts were made to capitalize on prosperity to reduce the amount of debts already made. Before 1930 it was not necessary to have the Government spend vast sums of money to support bread lines and give work to the unemployed. As a nation, we desired to set an example of thrift, and since a great majority of the veterans were employed, we were willing to let the matter care for itself. Today that situation has changed.

In the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, one of the longest ever held, we enacted legislation to help about every class in the United States, plunged further into debt to relieve distress, and adopted the policy of making huge Government expenditures to save the country from a national catastrophe.

I voted for the passage of all of these bills. I would do it again in the face of the conditions which were present at the time. And yet I believe that in adopting such a policy we proved there was a greater reason than ever for settling the debt to the veteran.

The return of better times has proven that we are, by any set of figures available from reliable sources today, definitely on the road to recovery. We have placed money in the hands of the masses, who have spent it to the advantage of all industry.

Through the Agricultural Adjustment Act, since declared unconstitutional, we have made it possible for the farmer to again enter the markets and buy goods of all kinds. By the enactment of the bill establishing the Civilian Conservation Corps we took more than half a million boys from idleness and placed them doing much-needed work and thereby helped their families who were in desperate condition. Through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation we assisted banks, life-insurance companies, railroads, and industry generally. I submit, gentlemen, that while we have been spending money for these projects, not to mention a $4,000,000,000 fund for direct and work relief, that the veterans of the World War have remained, after more than 18 years, the forgotten group in our assistance to the people of the Nation.

Since the war-clouded days of 1917, since the heydays we knew during the existence of national prosperity, the condition of the veteran has changed. The depression has written its scar across his brow, and yet he has been overlooked in all that we have attempted to do.

As I stated in the beginning of this address, loans amounting to about $1,335,000,000 have already been made against the adjusted-service certificates under the terms of an act of Congress passed in 1931. Assuming that the amount of the certificates averaged $1,000, and that the veteran secured loans amounting to one-half of this amount, his equity in the remaining $500 by the year 1945, after all interest deductions were made, would be about $180. One can only conclude from this that unless this bill is enacted the veteran will not receive the amount of money which the measure providing for adjusted compensation intended that he should receive. In view of these facts, I cannot help but wonder how many can maintain that these certificates should be held as an endowment for the veteran during the latter period of his life. No one wanted to fight a war to secure a paid-up endowment for $180.

The loss in income to the people of this Nation since the beginning of the depression has amounted to untold billions. I imagine that, were there any way of determining the exact amount, that it would be more than $100,000,000,000; and for the past 3 years we have been spending a fraction of this amount in our attempt to reduce this annual loss. I think that every business barometer points to the conclusion that we have been successful. I note that stores in all parts of the country enjoyed the largest volume of business this past December of any year since 1929, and I believe that the payment of this debt would have the same general effect on business.

Business, and by this I refer to financial and industrial groups, cannot realize a profit and witness the return of improved conditions until the man on the street has money with which to purchase their goods. It is the policy of this administration to provide that money in the form that would reach the greatest number of people, in a form designed to relieve the most distressed, and in a form which would, in many instances, be paid back with the return of better business conditions. This bill embodies all of these principles. We would be paying a debt already on the books of the Government, reaching men in every section of America, and helping a class who fully deserve such assistance.

These, gentlemen, constitute my reasons for voting for this bill here today.

I yield to no man in my devotion to the Government of the United States. I do not believe that we are considering today the question of pitting the veteran against business, or vice versa. This Nation cannot adopt a policy of creating class hatred; but as each of us realizes that American business played a part in helping to win the conflict, so must we understand that the man along the battle lines is due a just compensation for his service. This bill does not provide it; this Nation cannot afford to pay it, but this measure will at least indicate to some degree the appreciation we hold for those who fought for this country.

Flanders Field and other fields are dotted with the graves that mark the homes of the dead. These men gave everything for the cause that took us into the war. Their price for glory was the highest that man can offer; the price was the right to live. These men could not even be returned to their homes to be buried. Theirs was the lot of being content to rest in a foreign field. From the tobacco fields of Virginia, the orchards of California, the wheat fields of Nebraska, the oil fields of Texas, and the industrial and commercial areas of New York, these men laid down their work, aims, plans, and ambitions to answer a call to arms.

Through the long days of the war they fought, suffered, and died. With blood and gloom everywhere, they were America's contribution to the cause of democracy; it was they who saw the worst and accomplished the impossible.

It is all of these men that I am thinking of today. It is for all of them that I plead for justice and ask, in all sincerity, that this body pass the bill now under consideration. Only a white marker could be our contribution to the dead; some measure of security, some gift of happiness can serve as a token of appreciation to the living.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE].

STANDING TOGETHER AGAINST THE COMMON ENEMY—THE BIG BANKERS—WE WILL PAY THE SOLDIERS' CERTIFICATES THIS SESSION

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, in opening my remarks I want to concur with the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts who just preceded me, regarding the Veterans of Foreign Wars. We all like a fighting organization. The Veterans of Foreign Wars have shown this in their attitude on this legislation 100 percent. All down the line since the close of the World War they have never wavered in their support of this legislation. I am glad also that we have the united support of the three principal veterans' organizations on this legislation at this time—the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Legion, and the Disabled American Veterans. The Members of the House know that since I have had the honor of being a Member I have agreed wholeheartedly with the Patman plan of payment of this indebtedness. I hope we shall be able to work out this method of payment at this session of Congress. If we cannot work out this method of payment, then I am going to hold my nose and vote for a bond issue, but I see no reason why every time anything comes in here the big bankers of the country have got to come in and force their cut. I do not see why we should have to pay the bankers $2,000,000,000 in interest in order to pay the $2,000,000,000 that we owe the veterans.

THIS DEBT CAN BE PAID WITHOUT HURTING THE TREASURY

We have heard considerable discussion here this afternoon regarding the effect this legislation will have upon the Treasury. It has been pointed out the outstanding bonded indebtedness existing at this time as the reason for nonpayment, but we call to your attention that a similar large indebtedness confronted the Nation soon after the close of the World War.

This same plea was made by Mr. Mellon, the United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Economy League, the Manufacturers' Association, and by those who still have that same line of thought and was given as their reason for opposing the payment of this indebtedness. These same organizations and their line of thought never raised their voice, soon after the close of the World War when their organizations and many of their members stormed Washington and asked a much larger bonus to be paid the so-called war contractors, the railroads, the Federal employees, and the soldiers stationed at home to do civilian work each and all of whom received a much larger bonus than is here involved in this legislation today. Yet, these organizations and those who represent their line of thought advocated and demanded payment in cash to the above-mentioned parties a bonus amounting to several times as much as is involved in the balance due the soldier on his adjusted-service certificate. The outstanding bonded indebtedness was almost as great then as now, yet, these organizations demanded their "pound of flesh" and received it.

A LONG HARD FIGHT

The friends of the soldier presented their claim for an adjustment in their pay in March 1919. Many bills have been offered in each session of Congress since that time until finally the "tombstone" bonus was enacted into law on May 19, 1924, which is known as the adjusted-service certificate bill. It allowed the soldier $1 per day for home service and $1.25 per day for overseas service, and was payable January 1, 1945. It did not take into consideration any interest payment from the time the soldier's service was rendered until the legislation became effective January 1, 1925. Had this legislation been computed on the same basis as income-tax refunds to the wealthy and interest payments made accordingly, these adjusted-service certificates would have become due in 1931. Yet, because the above-named organizations have been able to maintain a strong lobby continuously in Washington and because of their ill-gotten gains received during the war and through their protective tariffs, tax refunds and other special privilege legislation they have been able to put over at Washington, they have been able to defeat this legislation session after session.

WEALTH CONTROLS POLITICS OF NATION

It is well known that the 4 percent who own more than 90 percent of the wealth of the Nation, who worked through these and other similar organizations control all known means of communication—the press, radio, telephone, telegraph—and because of their wealth through their propaganda, daily distributed Nation-wide, they have kept the veterans' organizations in turmoil and the people divided on what is fair and just for them, not only on this question but on most all of the economic questions of the day. These same organizations have raised all objections possible each and every time this measure has come before Congress for payment. One of their favorite tricks is to try to instill fear into the hearts of the Members with all kinds of tricky statements to the effect that payment of this just debt to the soldier will bankrupt the Treasury.

THE REAL TREASURY RAIDERS

I am wondering why these same objectors have not waved that same red flag when the big bankers come in here and raid the Treasury, when the railroads come in here and raid the Treasury, and when the Wall Streeters come down here and raid the Treasury on their many kinds of special-privileged pieces of legislation; when the favored few, the 4 percent who own 90 percent of the wealth of the country, are given secret tax refunds of over $4,000,000,000 in tax payments, plus interest at 6 percent from date of payment until repaid. I wonder why some of the spokesmen for these organizations do not have some of their friends stand down here in the well of the House and condemn those practices. It is always the soldiers that get the ax whenever any legislation comes up for their benefit.

DEBT LONG PAST DUE

Is this debt due? Of course it is due. No one can stand in the well of this House and contend with merit that the debt is not only due but long past due. Why can we not pay it? Did they not pay the big bankers soon after the war was over what they claimed was due them? The railroads were paid. The war contractors were paid even on estimated contracts that were not even attempted to be fulfilled. The profits of the contractors were paid, which ran into many more millions of dollars than is involved here. They paid every fellow connected with the war directly or indirectly except the fellows that kept the old flag flying—the soldier. The time has long passed for the payment of this compensation to the soldiers and sailors. It has been delayed too long. Now is the time, under distressed conditions, to do justice to the soldier as far as it is possible under this legislation. We are told it will require just a little over a billion dollars to pay this debt, taking into consideration funds now available.

PAY WITH PATMAN PLAN

I hope that after this authorization bill is passed a rule may be brought out for consideration whereby we will be given the opportunity to say whether or not we want to pay the balance due on this just indebtedness through the issuance of new currency. There should be currency in circulation upon which the bankers do not collect interest. Now is a good time to start in that direction. Is anything more inflationary than a Government bond, which the bankers use as a basis for the free use of the credit of this country in order to inflate currency to suit their own whims? Certainly there is not.

STOP FURTHER ISSUANCE OF TAX-EXEMPT BONDS

I agree 100 percent with the message delivered last session by the President of the United States, in which he said we ought to stop any further issuance of tax-exempt securities. We have too many tax-exempt securities now outstanding. We ought to change our reserve base so that we can pay off these outstanding tax-exempt securities by the issuance of new Treasury notes as and when these obligations come due. We are paying over $800,000,000 interest now to the holders of these Government securities. This is more money than it annually cost to run our Government before the World War. We have to cut down these expenses, and I am in favor of cutting where the cutting will hurt the least, and that is these fellows who largely own and control the country. Let us put them back into the banking business, where they belong, instead of the coupon-clipping business.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is the Liberty League and the United States Chamber of Commerce, and so forth, back of this bill at the present time?

Mr. McFARLANE. Yes; just like they always have been. They are out to defeat, in any way possible, each and every one who votes for this legislation wherever and whenever possible. We heard nothing of the American Liberty League or the United States Chamber of Commerce, the Manufacturers' Association, the National Economy League, the Sentinels of the Republic, or those who benefited the most by the tax-exempt program when that legislation was being enacted; but the minute something comes up for the benefit of the common people of the country, the people who have kept the stores of these individuals open and their factories running, then they say, if and when they see they cannot defeat such legislation, "Unless we get our cut, we are against you." That has always been their program of destruction. Now that we have saved them, they are out to destroy and defeat this administration if they can. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Indiana [Mrs. JENCKES].

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, a woman's viewpoint must be given consideration by the Congress while we are debating the soldiers' bonus legislation which is now before us.

It was the women who sent their men to defend our Nation. It was our American women who suffered.

American women are today enduring the hardships and are still paying the price of keeping America safe for democracy.

It was the women of America who promised our veterans that their service would never be forgotten.

I now stand before you as an American woman, as an American mother, and as a Member of Congress, appealing to this House of Representatives to pass the bonus bill by a large majority, so that our American women will know that the men of Congress are also keeping faith with our veterans.

America must pay this debt some future day.

Let us put some money in the empty pockets of our veterans by passing the bonus bill now.

I know this House of Representatives will hear the prayers and will answer the appeal of the women of America. Let us keep faith with oncoming generations of veterans.

Let us pay the veterans their well-earned bonus.

I thank you.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I expect to be one of a small minority to vote against the passage of this bill, H. R. 9870, and I feel justified in taking space in the RECORD to state my position very briefly.

First of all, the nature of the adjusted-service certificates should be clearly understood. To avoid inaccuracy let me quote from the act of May 19, 1924—the Bonus Act. Section 601, title 39, United States Code, reads as follows:

> The amount of adjusted-service credit shall be computed by allowing the following sums for each day of active service, in excess of 60 days, in the military or naval forces of the United States after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1919, as shown by the service or other record of the veteran: $1.25 for each day of overseas service and $1 for each day of home service; but the amount of the credit of a veteran who performed no overseas service shall not exceed $500, and the amount of the credit of a veteran who performed any oversea service shall not exceed $625.

The foregoing language defines the bonus. Any ex-soldier can easily figure the amount of the additional pay that was awarded him by the act of May 19, 1924.

A furious debate raged at that time on the question of paying the bonus in cash. We now know that if it had been done, the perennial controversy on the bonus question would have been avoided and the misunderstanding and the resentment that rankles in the hearts of many veterans would have been averted. It was determined, however, to be in the interest of the Government and the veteran himself to make payment in the form of a 20-year endowment insurance policy in the amount the veteran's bonus would purchase.

Section 641, title 38, United States Code, contains this provision, and the essential language reads as follows:

> The Director of the Veterans' Bureau is directed to issue without cost to the veteran designated therein a nonparticipating adjusted-service certificate of a face value equal to the amount in dollars of 20-year endowment insurance that the amount of his adjusted-service credit increased by 25 percent would purchase, at his age on his birthday nearest the date of the certificate, if applied as a net single premium, calculated in accordance with the accepted actuarial principles and based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality and interest at 4 percent per annum, compounded annually.

The adjusted-service certificates provided for in the foregoing section are, in fact, 20-year endowment policies with loan privileges and provision for payment of the maturity value to designated beneficiaries in case of the death of the insured during the life of the policies. They are dated January 1, 1925, and mature January 1, 1945. The amount due a holder of an adjusted-service certificate today is the basic credit plus 11 years' interest compounded at 4 percent. The bill calls for the payment of the face value of the certificates, which includes 20 years' compound interest at 4 percent. In the aggregate it amounts to an excess payment of approximately one and one-half billion dollars.

It was never intended that the Government should make a profit at the expense of veterans who availed themselves of the borrowing privilege. Since the certificates were figured on a basis of 4-percent interest, veterans should not have been charged a higher rate. Interest charged in excess of 4 percent should be refunded, but I cannot see the justification of canceling all the unpaid interest charged for loans. Neither can I see the justice of retaining the interest that has been paid and forgiving the unpaid interest.

Under the act of July 21, 1932, the holders of certificates were permitted to borrow up to 50 percent of the face amount of the certificates at 3½-percent interest. This act was passed for the benefit of necessitous veterans, but the liberal terms attracted many thousands of others, who made loans to put into business, speculation, and luxuries.

By this bill the people of the United States pay the veterans the amount of the extra compensation for war service they agreed in 1924 to pay, with interest to date, and a further payment of 9 years' additional interest. They also cancel all the interest, reasonable or unreasonable, that veterans have agreed to pay on their loans, except such interest as has been paid.

I do not feel that I have any more right as a Representative in Congress to vote for this bill than I would have as a trustee of a mutual life insurance company to vote to pay the face amount of endowment insurance held by a favored group 9 years before maturity and to cancel all the interest that may have accrued on policy loans.

We must not blind our eyes to the financial crisis which is rapidly approaching. The Federal Budget is out of balance to the extent of about two and one-half billion dollars. The national debt has reached unprecedented heights and is going higher. Prudent people know that we must pay the interest and reduce the principal. The A. A. A. decision of the Supreme Court will result in demands that the hundreds of millions for which the Government is obligated to farmers on illegal contracts be paid, that other hundreds of millions of illegal taxes paid by processors be refunded. It is almost certain that other New Deal measures will be found unconstitutional within the reasoning of the A. A. A. decision, which will result in similar burdens on the taxpayers. The vast majority of Americans realize that repudiation of debt through inflation means universal misery and despair and are reconciled to bear any tax burden that may be necessary to avoid that disaster. If I had voted for the profligate measures of this administration, the foolish and costly experiments, I could not in good conscience oppose this additional extravagance. But I have not done so.

I have received a great many letters which reveal poverty and distress in the homes of World War veterans that cannot fail to stir deep compassion and a desire to render immediate and effectual relief. It is not easy to say "no" to such entreaties. It is especially difficult for the Member who has served with these men, who knows their fine spirit of unselfish devotion to patriotic ideals 18 years ago, and realizes their present needs.

But it is not a relief bill; it is not designed to take care of the veterans in distress. If passed, this bill will permit every veteran to collect the maturity value of his adjusted-service certificate—the rich, the well-to-do, and the poor, the employed and unemployed, the able-bodied and disabled, alike.

There are many thousands of veterans now on relief. I assume the proportion is about the same as in other classes of citizens of the same age. The unfortunate veterans on relief give the proponents of this measure their chief oratorical inspiration. To such veterans I say this bill is a gold brick. As soon as their bonus is paid they will go off relief until they have spent their money. To them I say the passage of this bill means the loss of the equity in their certificates which will be due in 1945, and in the meantime the loss of the insurance benefits to the beneficiaries named.

The bill is not in the interest of the veteran who needs help most; it is frankly a surrender to minority "pressure groups", it is a breach of the contract made between the World War veterans and the American people in 1924, it is a serious threat to the tottering financial stability of the United States. Believing these things, I must vote against it.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am suddenly brought to the realization that all is not the harmony that has been portrayed to us. I thought that the Appropriations Committee, perhaps, and others were to decide the manner of payment of the bonus, but I find that a caucus may be called, and that the payment method of printing currency will be fought to the death practically as the method of payment. I cannot vote for this matter as I somewhat expected to do. I now practically have been given the assurance that that will be the method of payment. I am very sorry that the harmony is not what I thought it was.

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR] such time as he may desire.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I have had the pleasure of supporting every bonus proposition that has come before the Congress since 1920. I have deprecated the disagreement that has heretofore existed between the various veterans' organizations, and it is a source of much gratification to me that these organizations have got together in support of this measure.

There has been some suggestion that the payment of this bonus to the soldiers may be used as a pretext to deny them relief in the future. I understand an amendment will be offered to this bill to meet this contingency and prevent the use of any such pretext. When such an amendment is offered I shall take pleasure in supporting it. Having made many speeches in advocacy of bonus legislation in the past, I shall not undertake to discuss the merits of the proposal before us. While I think the amount which each veteran will receive in its final analysis is niggard compensation for his physical and economic sacrifices, I shall nevertheless support the bill, which I predict will pass this House practically unanimously, pass the other body by a large majority, and if vetoed by the President, pass both Houses over his veto. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HARTLEY].

Mr. HARTLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee a question, if I may. Can the gentleman tell what will be the situation of a veteran who is now on relief and who cashes in the balance of his certificate under this bill? Will he be taken off the relief?

Mr. DOUGHTON. There is nothing in this bill that would do that.

Mr. HARTLEY. If the policy that has been carried on in the past is continued, a veteran on relief who collects the balance of his certificate will be taken off relief.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I know of no reason why he would not, and if the bill is passed in its present form there is no reason why he should not if he has means with which to support himself. This bill does not deal with that matter.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARTLEY. Yes.

Mr. FISH. I think the gentleman has put his finger on one of the weaknesses in this bill. It will be absolutely unfair and preposterous if this bill is passed and these veterans get $700 or $800 apiece or $500, as an average, if they have borrowed money on their certificates, and then owe money to the banks or owe money for insurance or to meet other kinds of obligations and indebtedness, and when they pay this indebtedness there will be nothing left, and naturally they should not be taken off the relief, and I hope the gentleman from New Jersey and the gentleman from New York will put in an amendment that will insure their not being taken off the relief.

Mr. HARTLEY. That is just the point I am making, because if they are taken off relief they will be handing the veterans a gold brick.

Mr. KVALE. If the gentleman will permit, I think the gentleman from New Jersey has touched upon one of the most critical points brought up in this entire argument.

Mr. HARTLEY. I have inquired as to the position of a veteran on relief, should the proposed bonus bill become a law, for the purpose of demonstrating its most inequitable feature.

It would be an easy thing for me to vote for this bill as far as my district is concerned. In all probability it would be a most popular vote. However, the popular vote is not always the right one. In view of my belief that a majority of my constituents would have preferred to have me vote for this bonus proposal, I feel that I owe it to them to make an explanation of my position.

The bill, in the first place, is a "buck passing" measure in that it merely says, "Let's pass the bonus" and then leaves it up to someone else to find out where the money will come from. It has become a bad habit of those in public office to appropriate the taxpayers' money all too freely. Here we find the Congress of the United States calling for the appropriation of a sum, which may be over $2,000,000,000, out of a treasury which does not exist. As the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] so clearly stated, "We lack over $30,000,000,000 today of having a cent in the Federal Treasury."

While each veteran may point to the good that the payment of the bonus will do him individually, yet it fades into insignificance when we stop to consider how much the stability of his country's credit means to him. I feel certain that if the veterans of this country realized that the demands for billions and billions of dollars were retarding recovery and blocking their own opportunities for reemployment, they would not be so anxious to add this burden to the $30,000,000,000 national deficit.

I was amused to hear one of my beloved colleagues congratulate the leaders of the various veterans' organizations for their successful fight to have the bill passed. It was noticeable that in the list of those upon whose heads were placed the laurel wreaths of congratulations there was missing the noblest Roman of all, John Q. Public, the taxpayer.

There is but one legitimate argument that can be advanced for the payment of the bonus at this time, and that is that it would provide financial assistance to those veterans in distress. Just who are the veterans in greatest need? Obviously those who are on relief. It is ironic that they, the most deserving of all, will suffer rather than gain as a result of the passage of this bill. The veteran who is on relief will immediately be taken off the relief rolls when he cashes the balance of his certificate.

Passage of the bill today defeats the very purpose for which it was originally granted to the veteran. That was to keep in store for him a fund that would be most valuable to him at the time in his life when he would need it most.

As a Member of Congress I feel that I have an obligation to the veterans of this Nation but an even greater duty to the Nation at large. Even the threat of political reprisals will not deter me in voting on this matter as my conscience dictates—for the best interest of the Nation at large.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. EKWALL].

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, I may say at the outset that I am one who is going to vote for this bill. I voted for the bill similar to this one introduced during the last session of the Congress and voted to override the veto of the President.

I also want to pay a tribute to my friend Jimmy Van Zandt, national commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, to Ray Murphy national commander of the American Legion, and the national commander of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War for having agreed upon this bill which will at least bring a modicum of justice to the ex-service men and women of this country, veterans of the World War.

There have been some specious arguments made here during the day. I have the greatest respect and reverence in the world for the very able chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman makes the argument that it is impossible to measure what we owe the veterans of this country in dollars and cents. He reminds me of a case that came before me when I was sitting on the circuit bench in Oregon at one time when we had a defendant charged with taking some money that did not belong to him. His argument was that he got the money that did not belong to him mixed in his pocket with money that did belong to him and he did not want to cheat himself; therefore he kept it all. [Laughter.]

Of course, we cannot measure in dollars and cents what we owe to the ex-service men and women, but that does not mean that we cannot at least give them the minimum of justice to which they are entitled. It does not mean that we are going to turn them out and give them nothing at all because we cannot measure to a mathematical certainty what we owe them. The genial gentleman from Texas used the illustration of the sinking ship and of the rowboat full of survivors, depicting that, as the sun was descending over the horizon, they commenced dividing what was left in the way of food, and the gentleman says that, of course, there would be no one who would want more than his or her share of the food. Why, of course not; but if some of them were so greedy as to want their food the minute they were in the boat and took more than their share, then where is the injustice if the survivors at nightfall desired at least a portion of what was coming to them at the outset?

I say that is a specious argument; that it is no argument at all. It seems to me that the picture which the opponents of this bill have painted of dire disaster that will come to our country by paying these several billions of dollars does not come with good grace from many of them who have voted to spend lavishly the money of the taxpayers of this country. If this bill were submitted to the people by a referendum, I believe they would vote overwhelmingly to pay the soldiers, the sailors, the members of the Marine Corps, and the women who are veterans of the World War the benefits provided under this bill.

The gentleman from Iowa said that we were told at one time that when the service certificates were adjusted in 1925 that would be the end of it. Yes; we were also told when we went into the World War that it was the war to end wars and that it would be the last war. Yet there are wars and rumors of war all around us, and any man who has the ability to think knows that we are in danger at all times when the world conditions are as they exist today.

I was in the Army for a few months as a private of Infantry; not in the American Expeditionary Forces, but in the Arkansas expeditionary forces at Camp Pike. I have not a cent coming to me on an adjusted-service certificate; so I am not speaking from a selfish standpoint, but I am speaking for simple justice to those who have certificates. I believe it will, as has been argued here, be a recovery measure to some extent, because the veterans want to take this money which has been due them for 17 years and pay their honest debts, they want to pay their taxes on their homes, they want to pay these bankers, whom they owe, and to pay the butcher, the baker, and the candlestick maker.

Some Members of Congress call this a bonus. That is a misnomer. It should never have been called that. It is the payment of adjusted-service certificates. There is no bonus provided for in this bill. The only ones who received a bonus were shipyard owners, munition manufacturers, and possibly others who profited in other lines by furnishing supplies to the Government. And I am not speaking disparagingly of those people, because they all did their bit to win the war, but everybody has been paid, every Tom, Dick, and Harry, except the men and women who actually won the war; the men and women who lived in the muck and the mud and the slime of France in order to hold our flag up; and when anyone says here that they are asking for special gratuities, I say that is an insult to the ex-service men and women of this country. I wish that George Washington, Lafayette, "Old Hickory", Theodore Roosevelt, or any of the great soldiers of the past were here so that we might get their opinion as to whether this is a gratuity. They would throw such words into the teeth of the accusers of the ex-service men and women, because it is not a gratuity. It is simple justice.

We have already used up too much time in arguing this question. Let us pay these certificates at once; let us get them paid over the veto of the President, if necessary, and get this question definitely behind us, so that we can attend to some other business in this Congress and throughout the United States. I have no fear but that the people of this country are for the payment of the adjusted-service certificates. When our soldiers left our country for France the Government told them that we would be behind them. We are behind, all right, 17 years behind, in giving what is due them. We have paid everybody except the soldiers. The country knows this bill is going to pass, and yet the business improvement is noted every day. The earnings in various lines of endeavor are increasing.

Business is not afraid that the payment of the adjusted-service certificates will wreck the financial structure of the country. I wish some of these gentlemen who are arguing against this bill would use their talents against some of the specious bills that are coming in before this Congress; some bills that call for appropriations which, if passed, will wreck the financial structure of the country beyond peradventure of doubt. I wish they would use their ability along that line—to argue against some of the really dangerous bills, in comparison to which this bill and the amount involved fade into insignificance.

Our good friend, Mr. SUMNERS of Texas, may not be a prophet; but if not, at least he is the son of a prophet when he says that this bill is going to pass. There is no finer man in this Congress, and I venture to say that in a short time after this bill becomes a law he will acknowledge that he was mistaken in his opposition and will be glad to admit it. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to go on record favoring the immediate payment of the adjusted-services certificates. It is only just that we should compensate our ex-service men for the valuable service they have rendered to their country. I am always willing to support legislation which will benefit our ex-service men and their dependents.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWEENEY].

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Chairman, it gives me pleasure to announce that I shall wholeheartedly support the measure now before the House authorizing the full payment of adjusted-service certificates. On three occasions I supported legislation looking toward the payment of this obligation. In each instance I followed the Patman plan of payment. I am committed to this method of meeting the payment of this obligation to the veterans rather than the issuance of tax-exempt interest-bearing bonds.

While the question of the method of payment is not an issue in the consideration of this measure before us, nevertheless, it is pertinent to discuss briefly some phases of this subject, because the Congress will be bound to meet this responsibility in the very near future, after the authorization of this payment is passed by both Houses of Congress.

It seems unbelievable that this Nation, through its National Legislature, will authorize payment of a bond issue, which, after all, will mean a bonus for the bankers when we have complete ownership of over ten billion of idle gold and silver in the vaults of the United States Treasury. It is unbelievable that our Nation in the role of Santa Claus to the world would neglect legitimate demands of the veterans who were willing to pay the supreme sacrifice in the last World War, a war in which they had no choice of decision one way or other. We cannot forget the cancelation of the war debts to the Allies; the bonus to railroads, bankers, and big industries who profited by the last World War.

Mr. Chairman, when the payment of this obligation is made we will extend a ray of hope to thousands and thousands of distressed veterans and their dependents who are, many of them, on the verge of starvation and in many cases unable to secure the bare necessities of life. Many of us are familiar with the plight of the veteran who is receiving $20 or $25 a month compensation for some disability incurred in the line of duty, denied the right to obtain employment under the Government Public Works Administration because they receive this mere pittance from their Government. We are familiar with other cases of veterans who are denied direct relief from various governmental agencies because of the same reason. Those of us who were in Congress at that time can never forget the spectacle of the bonus marchers who came to petition for aid and who were driven, at the point of machine guns, from the Nation's Capital by the Hoover administration. Many of us can never forget the insults directed against the veterans by the so-called Economy League and the war profiteers when the Economy Act was under consideration. These groups took special delight in referring to the ex-service men of the Nation as "parasites." I have a firm conviction that this Congress will pass this legislation and meet the payment of this obligation without any direction or consideration from the Economy League, the Liberty League, or the plutocrats of Wall Street. No time should be lost in securing the necessary method of payment of this obligation.

In my opinion, the Patman plan, issuing Treasury certificates in lieu of a tax-exempt, interest-bearing bond issue presents a solution to this problem and undoubtedly will meet with the approval of a great majority of the people of this country. This was evident by the tremendous vote accorded the Patman plan in the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress. Congressman Wright Patman deserves great credit for the progress of this legislation to date.

I salute the commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars of the United States, James Van Zandt, and his organization, for their untiring efforts in behalf of the veterans in presenting and supporting legislation of this nature. I pay tribute at this time to one individual in this country who has done more than any other in publicizing the Patman plan of payment of the adjusted-service certificates. I refer to Rev. Father Charles Coughlin, founder of the National Union for Social Justice. Father Coughlin has educated our people through his radio discourses in exposing the privately owned money-controlled racket disguised as our Federal Reserve Banking System. He has turned the spotlight on the "money changers" who were able by a sleight-of-hand operation to inflate the money credit of the Nation to the sum of $58,000,000,000 in 1929, and then to bring about a complete collapse of our banking structure in 1932 when, through a scarcity of money, banks were unable to pay their depositors the hard-earned savings entrusted with them primarily for safekeeping.

Our people are determined to take control of our monetary system by the creation of a central national bank of the United States, and restore to Congress its constitutional power of coining and regulating the value of money. This administration is on record to drive the "money changers from the temple." It must make good its sacred promise to the people of the United States, or stand repudiated before the civilized world.

I am interested in voting for this measure and for a subsequent measure to insure the payment of these certificates, not only because of the assistance it will give to the veterans and their dependents, but because it will create a purchasing power so necessary to the welfare of the Nation today. Every avenue of trade and business will be substantially benefited by the payment of these adjusted-service certificates. In the State of Ohio alone will go $117,000,000.

The majority of veterans need this money, as is evidenced by the fact that out of close to 4,000,000 eligibles all but 500,000 have borrowed on their certificates.

I am glad to cast my vote in behalf of this measure, and to know it has every possible chance of victory; that the obligation, long the football of politics and unnecessarily delayed, will be met by the Members of this Congress.

Let us remove the stigma that in many quarters seems to attach itself to the veterans as being unpatriotic. Let us demonstrate to the nations of the world that there are still men and women in this Seventy-fourth Congress who remember the sacrifices of those who fought a so-called bankers' war in the interest of a so-called democracy, and prove to them that we are grateful when other selfish money-mad interests who eulogized them before the war, but with deliberation and malice turned their backs upon them when the smoke of battle had cleared and the armistice was signed.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I heartily supported the measure when the first bill authorizing the issuance of the adjusted-compensation certificates came before the Congress. I was then in favor of paying same in cash, and then urged the passage of such an amendment. I have voted for every bill to pay these adjusted-compensation certificates, and have spoken in favor of same from this floor. I have signed the petitions on the Clerk's desk that made it possible to consider and pass such bills, and in every instance I have voted to override the President's veto.

I am going to support this bill and help to pass it. And if it should be vetoed, I am going to vote to override the President's veto.

I do not believe there is an American in the United States who for the amount in one of these certificates would leave his family or business for as much as 30 days on an enforced stay abroad. I think it is only just to pay these adjusted-compensation certificates to our men who served us during the World War.

I yield back the remainder of my time, and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks hereafter on this subject in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER].

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I realize that I am very greatly in the minority on this question.

I also realize that this bill will pass and become law, either with or without Presidential approval, and that my individual vote against it will be ineffectual.

Good politics, therefore, might dictate that I vote for it, save myself from the criticism of those in my district who earnestly desire its passage, and at the same time salve my conscience by the statement that my vote against it would not have affected the result.

I cannot do that. I am completing 10 years of service in Congress, during which time I have never voted for or against any measure except as I believed was in the best interests of my country, and I cannot begin now to do otherwise.

I voted against the Economy Act when every other Congressman from my State supported it. I incurred severe criticism by reason of that vote. It was cast in the interest of justice for sick and disabled veterans and I have never had reason to regret it.

I have several times voted against prepayment of the bonus, explaining that I could not do so so long as the financial condition of the Government is such that the expenditure of this vast sum of money will endanger national economic recovery. The money, of course, must be borrowed. We have not got it. Just how much more we can borrow without straining national finances to the breaking point I do not know. No one else seems to know. I do not want our country to find out by actual experience. Certainly there must be a limit to what even the richest country in the world may borrow and spend.

Since I last voted against payment of the bonus our national debt has increased by billions of dollars. Taxes of the people have been largely increased. If I could not vote for it when our debt was less, when our taxes were less, how can I vote for it now, when our national debt is growing by leaps and bounds and when no one seems to know when we may hope to balance our expenditures with our receipts. If I as an individual spend year after year more than I take in, the sheriff will soon be knocking on my door. In my judgment, a nation cannot long continue to do it.

The customary reply to this argument is that this purpose is just as worthy as some of those for which billions are being spent. I shall not take issue with that. Many of those billions I voted against spending. The passage of this bill does not substitute the payment of the bonus for these other expenditures. It simply adds it on top of everything else.

In speeches I made in my district during my last candidacy for reelection I stated that I could not vote to pay the bonus until such time as the financial condition of the country would permit it to be done without endangering the welfare of all our people. I have already pointed out that since then the indebtedness of our Government has vastly increased. Therefore, when I vote against this bill today I am according with every statement I have ever made to my people, veterans and all, regarding this issue. I am standing firm, where I told them I would stand; and I am convinced that my constituents, including the veterans, would have no respect for me if I changed my position on this issue, when I could have no reason therefor except political cowardice. So far as I know, I have never been accused of that.

Although my vote today against this bill will be ineffective, I never cast one which I have felt was more thoroughly in accord with the best interests of the American people.

Those who go to extremes either to economize by taking away proper allowances for sick and disabled veterans on the one hand, or, on the other hand, by borrowing money on the Nation's credit to pay to veterans, whether sick or disabled or not, on obligations not due under the terms of the law by which they were created, will find little in future history to make them proud of their actions. Among those who are so ardent in their efforts to pay this debt before its maturity date, to rich and poor, sick and able-bodied alike, will be found many who whooped on the Economy Act for the oppression of the sick and disabled veteran. They were riding a wave of popular sentiment then; they are riding in an opposite direction a wave of popular sentiment now; but after the waves have subsided and the calm follows the storm they will in my judgment have cause for regret that they went to either extreme. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK].

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I have no prepared speech to make and I have no desire to occupy your time except to say that I am for this bonus bill, and that I am for any other pension legislation which may be brought into this House. I am somewhat like my old friend Dick Austin, long since gone to his reward. There are a few old timers here who will remember Dick Austin, of Tennessee, and who possibly will recall hearing him make the statement on the floor of this House that he never voted for a tax bill in his life and never voted against an appropriation bill, and never expected to. I can go that far when pension legislation is involved and say that I have never voted against a piece of legislation in which the soldiers or their dependents were interested, nor do I ever expect to.

I know that every one of my constituents, whether they are in favor of this bonus or not know my record as the soldiers' friend and expect me to vote for the immediate cash payment of the bonus. I am very happy to again have the opportunity to vote for this bill. I will be happy to vote again for it, if I am compelled to do so, over a Presidential veto, but hope and pray our great President will recognize this honest and just debt.

If I have the further opportunity, I wish to say here and now that I will vote preferably for the Patman plan of payment, because I have never been able to understand why it is inflation for the Government to issue non-interest-bearing notes secured by gold and silver in our Treasury vaults and it is not inflation for the Government to issue interest-bearing obligations. Either is debt, and debt is inflation. One costs the taxpayer nothing and the other means more and higher taxes. But if the bankers and bondholders must have their way, I will vote for any means of raising the needed cash to discharge immediately this long overdue debt to the boys who risked their all for democracy. The buck has been passed long enough. Let us be honest and pay the boys without further delay.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I favor paying the adjusted-service certificates in cash. I feel that those certificates are a debt which our Government has acknowledged as due and owing to our ex-soldiers for services rendered.

It is not necessary for me to take up the time of the committee, and therefore I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I was very much pleased to hear the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHBROOK] speak on this subject. Mr. ASHBROOK and I met here first in 1907.

Of course we have met frequently but not on the same side of the political division.

I was also greatly impressed with my personal friend—the great philosopher and judge from Texas, Mr. SUMNERS. I just learned this last summer much about the Texas Members. I have been wondering a good many years about them. They seem to have a special sort of energy, courtesy, and kindness. I might say, in all truth, they are all gentlemen and statesmen, hence the impressiveness of the Judge's benevolent speech. I read a history of the Republic of Texas. Who ever heard of the Republic of Texas or anything about it? You may have heard about Col. Sam Houston coming up here to the Senate, but you never heard about the navy they had. It never occurred to you that those Members from Texas are nearly all descendants of old Pennsylvania ancestors. So that is how we account for some of the genius and flash of ability that we find here in the Texas delegation. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, in approaching this bonus question I am compelled to think of what it is all about and how it occurred. I see before me quite a number who are in large measure responsible for the necessity of having a bonus. Like myself, many of you followed the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States into the greatest war of all time. I believe that of the then membership of this House, about 400, less than 20 voted against sustaining the President in his declaration of war. We went in. Does anyone wonder why I, or any others who voted for that war, would be for the bonus or for anything else for the soldier?

Without relating any other circumstances or the family ties broken on account of the war, the Spanish-American War or the Civil War, this World War is sufficient for me, gentlemen. I know it will be all-sufficient for those who were here as we approached that war and went into it. We saw not the selective draft, but the rankest kind of conscription. It was conscription to the bone, conscription which stripped the colleges of the young men, and the banks of the clerks, and the homes and farms of the sons and young men who were there to work, and sent them across the ocean to save the world for democracy. I will not take the time to discuss the kind of democracy they have over there nor how they lied to and cheated our President, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, whom we followed into that war. None the less, those boys having been trained, many of them, in England less than 2 weeks, were sent across to meet the iron lines of the greatest troops ever trained in the world. Those young American boys were put into the trenches, and then at that fateful hour of 5 o'clock in the morning, like the quick, sharp snap of a rifle, they went over the top, and if they died they died with wounds in the front. They made good, even under those circumstances. Now, the question comes to an adjustment of something. Adjustment of something! What is the matter with the country today? I have been here for nearly 18 years, and I look around me for the statesmanship that would solve this problem. This is the richest country in all the world, capable of solving anything if it would only do it, but it does not do it. It is a simple matter of adjustment. The wealth of this country is so great that it cannot be computed. We have half the gold of the world resting in the Treasury of this country. Economists tell me that we have agricultural resources capable of sustaining 3,000,000,000 people instead of 130,000,000. Then someone asks where you are going to get something to eat, and statesmanship staggers when it comes to distributing and peacefully equalizing our vast God-given bounty.

It is because we do not know how to regulate and have not balanced things. And now are we going to make this same mistake with these boys and this bill? I voted for a similar measure 13 years ago. I do not recall just how it was regulated, but I am inclined to think there is something yet undisclosed in this present measure. You know an old legislator somehow or other, like the editor that I am and have a nose for news, gets a nose for things that are going on in a legislative body. I suspect that when you get done with this thing, instead of using the wealth of the Nation as you have it piled up down here you will use it for something else and call upon the Congress to vote for direct taxation or no bonus. Let that sink into your system a little while. I deliver this to you as one who has had experience in this kind of business. I am sorry you have not designated the way in which it is to be paid and thus finish the job today, even to passing the bill instead of taking it up again at some future date and again stirring up this contention and argument. So far as I am concerned, you know where I stand from what I have said; and I want to say for the State of Pennsylvania—I think I can speak as well for this State as anyone here, having longer served this Commonwealth as a member of both the upper and lower houses at Harrisburg, and having been a Member of this House of Representatives a long time, representing eight great counties located in the heart of the mighty State of Pennsylvania—I say to you it is my opinion that anyone who says that Pennsylvania, the home and the pride of Reynolds, Hancock, Meade, and of Gregg, and the rest of the generals and soldiers who stood in defense of the Union against one of the greatest armies and some of the greatest generals the South produced, whoever says that that great State will ever deny the soldier his due does not correctly represent the State. Anyone who represents the State of Pennsylvania may have his own opinion, but, in my judgment, what he may say here contrary to the sentiment I have just uttered does not express the true opinion, the patriotism, and the spirit of the people of Pennsylvania, especially not when he would deny this relief to these soldiers of the great World War. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, at the very outset I desire to go on record not only as favoring this bill but to state that an excellent piece of work was done in presenting a united front for the principle of the immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates. The question of method of payment, of course, will come to us at some future time and will be threshed out at that time. Then I shall urge the honest method of payment. To raise the needed funds by placing the British rate of taxes on all incomes of $5,000 or more, as is provided in my bill, H. R. 8365, thereby placing the burden where it belongs.

There is just one feature of this bill to which I would call the attention of the Members, and that is the question of relief, the question of protecting the unemployed veteran. What is to happen to the unemployed veteran if this bill becomes a law? The moment an unemployed veteran receives any benefits under this bill he will immediately be discharged from relief, work relief, W. P. A., or direct relief, because, under the relief regulations, the F. E. R. A. rules, and the W. P. A. rules any person having any means is not given direct relief nor is he given work relief. For instance, any person who has an insurance policy is required to surrender the policy for its cash value, and he is not granted relief until the funds derived from the cash-surrender policy are exhausted. Carrying this further, the W. P. A. and the F. E. R. A. have insisted that veterans who had not borrowed on their adjusted-service compensation certificates had to do so before they would be granted relief, or, if they were on relief and borrowed, they were automatically discharged from the relief rolls or from the W. P. A. until the money received for their certificates had been spent to the satisfaction of relief bureaucrats.

It may be argued, of course, that if you give the unemployed veteran his adjusted-service certificate in cash he is not entitled to relief, but I answer such argument by stating that if you are interested in the veterans, if you are earnestly and sincerely in favor of the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates, that with the bill in its present shape, what you would be doing in the case of the unemployed veteran would be simply to give him a lump sum relief payment. You would not be giving him any bonus, you would simply be giving him relief in a lump sum; and you would be, therefore, discriminating against the unemployed veteran. If there is any immediate reason for the immediate payment of the bonus it is because of the large number of veterans on relief or employed on W. P. A. jobs, it is because of the large number of veterans who are in need. If you are going to give these men a certain sum of money and then throw them off relief, their money will be gone before they have actually received it, it will be of absolutely no value to them.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The county regulations in my State go so far as even to make applicants for relief having insurance policies turn in their policies at their cash surrender value.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I stated that.

Mr. O'MALLEY. How is the Federal Congress to control relief regulations in the municipal subdivisions of the various States?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. In this respect: Every county is today receiving Federal funds under the F. E. R. A., and all of the work relief is under the W. P. A., which is Federal. In order to protect the unemployed veterans, I shall offer at the proper time an amendment to this bill, which I have heretofore publicly announced, in which I intend to provide that no Federal agency shall in any manner or by any means deduct the amount of compensation received by a veteran pursuant to the provisions of this act from any sum payable to him in whole or in part from Federal funds for work relief or other unemployment relief, nor shall any such Federal agency in any manner alter the status of such recipients of compensation pursuant to the provisions of this act.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. How is that going to control the relief regulations in those counties, cities, and States that are not getting Federal money or which have spent the Federal money they have heretofore received?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The Federal agency which is turning over funds to the local agency is controlled by this amendment, if the amendment is adopted and enacted into law. The Federal agency will then turn over these funds pursuant to this amendment. As a matter of fact, today your local rules must be ratified by the F. E. R. A. or the W. P. A. before Federal funds are given to local relief agencies, so that the counties today cannot adopt any particular rules for the distribution of relief, when it is receiving Federal funds, without approval of the F. E. R. A. or the W. P. A. When this amendment becomes a law, the Federal Emergency Relief Administration and the Works Progress Administration will be bound by this law, and they must incorporate this provision as a part of their rules before turning over money to local agencies and the local agencies must comply with this rule, otherwise they cannot qualify for the purpose of receiving Federal funds.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The F. E. R. A. and the W. P. A. funds will be constrained by the gentleman's amendment, but how about the cities, counties, and States that are not going to receive Federal aid?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. A county or city, in order to receive Federal money, must comply with these rules. We cannot control those cities and counties which do not receive Federal money for relief purposes. If we pass this amendment, as a practical matter we will be controlling the vast majority of the counties and the vast majority of the cities, because they are receiving Federal aid, either by virtue of the Works Progress Administration or by the payment of direct allotments for relief purposes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I do not believe the gentleman's amendment will reach the unemployables which have already been turned back to the States and local communities. No doubt there are many thousands of veterans who are, for physical reasons, unemployable.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I will concede that in those cases where Federal funds do not reach these unemployed veterans, my amendment would not apply, but that does not by any means weaken the argument that this amendment should be adopted. We certainly should adopt the amendment insofar as it applies; and, as I have stated before, for all practical purposes it will apply to the vast majority of the unemployed veterans.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that the problem of unemployment relief is the most important question which this Congress has to face. We may not have to face it now, but we will in a month, 2 or 3 months from now, when there will be hunger marchers throughout the United States.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I think this amendment should be adopted. I believe also that the force of public sentiment in the local communities will be such that no relief authority will have nerve enough to take veterans off the relief because they are getting a bonus which they were entitled to a good many years ago.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I think we should do all we can to protect the unemployed veteran, otherwise in the place of a bonus you are giving him a lemon which has already been through the wringer.

Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for this bill irrespective of whether my amendment is adopted or not. I am sincerely for the bill and will support it, because I am and have always been 100 percent for the bonus but I intend to protect the unemployed veterans in the United States at the same time. Why not? They are the ones who need the bonus and need it more than the employed veteran. That is the reason I always urged for immediate payment. If you deprive the unemployed veteran of relief, then you are just giving him a lump-sum relief payment. It may be said that public opinion may be aroused, that the taxpayers may be aroused against a payment of this kind.

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, in answer to that contention, may I say that the taxpayer who is opposed to the payment of the bonus will continue to be opposed to the payment of the bonus whether this amendment is in effect or not, while the taxpayer who is in favor of the payment of the bonus will be in favor of the payment of the bonus regardless of whether the amendment is adopted or not. I appeal to all the Members to bear the unemployed veteran in mind, because if he is not protected you are going to hear from him the moment he realizes the discrimination being practiced against him. I also hope that after this bill passes, that we will not stop here. This bill is only an authorization. We must enact a method of payment and an appropriation. The job is only half done with the passage of this bill. I trust that this Congress will finish this job before we adjourn.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT].

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, as a general rule I favor extended debate on all issues. I particularly favor it on controversial issues. Paradoxical as it may seem, the issue which is now before us, the full and immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates, which only a few years ago was perhaps the most controversial issue that had ever come into the Congress, has now ceased, in effect, to be a controversial issue at all.

And so, since there is now no real controversy in the House over the bill, I believe that the Rules Committee acted wisely when it limited debate upon it to 4 hours, because in that time I am sure all who wish may have an opportunity to express their views upon this legislation.

The progress of the fight for the full cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates, which began as a minority movement, and which has now reached a stage when it is supported by an overwhelming majority, not only of the Congress but of the country, is one of the most remarkable things in all the history of legislation; and I think the sweeping nature of this transition from minority to majority support is enough in itself to give the lie to those opponents of the bonus who for years have been trying to make the country believe that the veterans and the friends of the veterans in Congress in advancing this legislation have been actuated by selfish or by political motives.

There are no such motives behind this legislation, and the propaganda of its opponents to the contrary has long since been repudiated by nearly everyone who has made an actual study of the issues involved in this legislation. A legislative proposal advanced by a minority group, which this legislation was originally, may make some temporary progress in the Congress; but unless the proposal is sound from an economic angle and unless it is just from a humanitarian angle, it will not in the ordinary course of events become law. A bill first advocated by a minority becomes law only when a majority of the Congress and the country have become persuaded of the merit and the justice and the necessity of it. It then becomes a majority instead of a minority proposal.

This has been the case with the proposal to pay the bonus. By the sheer merit and justice of the proposition it has transformed itself from a minority to a majority movement, until now its enactment into law is demanded by the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the United States, veterans and nonveterans alike. There are a few who sincerely and honestly still believe that this legislation is not justified, and for the opinion of these honest few I have a profound respect, even though I do not agree with them. But the opponents of the bonus for the most part now consist of that selfish and unpatriotic minority who denounce it solely because, on account of their wealth, they know that the burden of its payment will fall largely upon themselves.

The active forces opposed now to the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates are the same forces which have opposed every consideration that the grateful people of this Nation have ever proposed to extend to those who have fought its battles. They are the same forces which in the distressing and hysterical days of 1933 demanded that the pensions and compensation of our disabled veterans be taken away from them in the name of economy. They not only demanded this but they succeeded actually in accomplishing it through passage of the Economy Act. A rubber-stamp Congress, under the whip of the present administration, did their bidding in this regard. That Congress, I am glad to say, has since repented and has repealed every vestige of the Economy Act.

It has been my privilege as a Member of this body during the past 3 years to cast a vote upon some of the most momentous questions that have ever come before the Congress. I have taken a pardonable pride in some of these votes. Of these, I am proudest of all of the vote which I cast against the economy bill. That was a minority vote and represented a minority sentiment, a sentiment which has since changed to a majority one, because everyone now, regardless of party, has become convinced that the Economy Act was wrong, just as they have become convinced that the payment of the bonus is right.

Let me repeat that most of the remaining opposition to the payment of the bonus is now confined to that small minority of which the members of the Economy League are outstanding examples and that their opposition is based upon utterly selfish motives, just as it was when they advocated the Economy Act. The rest of the people of the United States have long since become convinced that the adjusted-service certificates should be paid in full and paid now.

Under the circumstances, therefore, there is no great need for argument upon this bill, and for that reason I am merely going to take this opportunity to congratulate the three great veterans' organizations of the United States, the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Disabled American Veterans, upon their unanimous agreement on the particular bill which is now before us for the purpose of paying the adjusted-service certificates. I congratulate the Ways and Means Committee for reporting it to us so early in the session, and I congratulate the Rules Committee for its promptness in bringing it up for our consideration and disposal.

This, of course, is not the first time that the representatives of the people in Congress have overwhelmingly voted for this legislation. Practically all of us here now have voted for this legislation at least once. I voted for it when it was before us at the last session, as did most of my colleagues. This is, however, the first time that we will have had an opportunity to vote for a bonus bill under circumstances which render our votes effective. Heretofore we have always been obliged to consider the possible result upon the bill of a Presidential veto, and in framing the bill we have always been obliged to frame it with a view to the probability of a successful fight to override the veto. This time there will be no fight. This time we are strong enough to leave the probable action of the President out of our considerations, and I predict that the President's veto, if he does veto it, will be overridden by an almost unanimous vote both of the House and the Senate.

And so I think we are all to be congratulated upon the opportunity which has finally come to us, the opportunity of doing long-deferred justice to the veterans of our country, and the opportunity of effectively carrying out the mandate of the whole people of the country whom we represent here in the national lawmaking body. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, during the discussion this afternoon we have heard a lot about the various methods of paying these certificates to the soldiers, and some day I want either the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], or some other equally illuminating intellect in this House, to explain to me at least, and I shall be pleased to listen, the difference, insofar as inflation is concerned, between the Government's seal on a bond and the Government's seal on a currency note.

I am not going to take up additional time on this question except to get in the RECORD some correspondence I have had with a constituent of mine involving the question of my position on the payment of the soldiers' bonus and the neutrality legislation. I should like to read this correspondence to the Committee:

KITTANNING, PA., January 6, 1936.

Hon. JOSEPH GRAY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Kindly favor me with a frank and concise statement of your position on the question of the soldiers' bonus and neutrality.

If you favor payment of the bonus, may I ask how you plan to finance it? On the question of neutrality, I am interested in your position on every phase of the subject.

The Seventy-fourth Congress will be called upon to act on both these questions. Naturally, we at home are deeply interested in what you will do with them.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) H. C. WIDDOWSON.

Mr. H. C. WIDDOWSON,
660 Woodward Avenue, Kittanning, Pa.

DEAR MR. WIDDOWSON: I have your letter of January 6 requesting a frank statement of my position on the soldiers' bonus and neutrality.

As I had often publicly stated during the campaign of 1934 that I favored the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates, and in the last session of Congress voted to override the Presidential veto of the Patman bill, I supposed my position on the subject was commonly known.

I still favor the payment of the so-called bonus. To me that payment is the fulfillment of a just obligation due the ex-service men of the World War. It is my preference that this payment be made by the issuance of currency because the Government owns sufficient gold to justify such issue, which will be something in excess of $2,000,000,000.

If that method of payment cannot be enacted into law, it is my intention to support the payment of the certificates by the only other method I know of; that is, by the issuance of Government bonds, which bonds will be interest-bearing, and, most likely, tax-exempt. The interest-bearing, tax-exempt bond issue does not arouse any enthusiasm in me, because the final cost to the Government for the payment of the bonus will be thereby enormously increased, and the issuing by the Government of interest-bearing, tax-exempt bonds for any purpose is meeting with growing opposition in Congress, many Members of which express the opinion that such bond issues should be discontinued entirely. As stated, however, I am for the immediate cash payment of the certificates.

Regarding the pressing present question of neutrality, different views and opinions are being presented from day to day. There does not seem to be any decidedly fixed and satisfactory plan. It is a somewhat new legislative question, and one on which it is very difficult to take a firm stand and, at the same time, be sure that such position is for the best interests of our country, for avoidance of war, and for the peace of the world.

We should not, I think, deviate from a policy of evading all foreign entanglements. It is difficult in the light of history to give full faith and credit to British and European diplomacy, or to believe that certain American financial interests interwoven with international like interests, in case of stress or threatened gain, always act in a way to promote harmony in the world. It appears quite clear to me personally that the way for America to preserve its neutrality in the event of wars in which it is not originally a belligerent is to avoid all entanglements in the diplomatic maneuvering which precedes those wars and which is usually evident as a preliminary to actual hostilities.

Because of fear of embroilment in other nations' wars and because scarcely a move can be made on the international chessboard without affecting the commercial nerve of the far-flung British Empire, I want no part in the League of Nations, no connection with the World Court, no slipping into these beautifully conceived but dangerous institutions by back-door passage, and precious little to do with their various forms of sanctions.

International relations are very complex, sensitive, and far-reaching. If the United States can avoid being drawn into the introductory web of diplomatic chicanery, which fosters, begets, or betokens war, then we are in a fair way to escape such calamities.

As for ourselves, I favor a national defense strong enough by land, by sea, and by air as will cause all other nations and empires, and any combinations thereof, to hesitate and then count ten before starting to work out any of their economic, commercial, or imperialistic designs upon our national integrity.

I have stated to you my position on the questions as concisely and candidly as I know how.

Sincerely yours,

JOSEPH GRAY.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE].

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I shall support this adjusted-compensation-certificate legislation. Those who do not find a way to pay these certificates because of other Government indebtedness remind me of the man who came to town with his wife, and he asked her before starting home if there was anything she wanted before they started home. She said her tooth was still aching and she would like to have 50 cents to have it pulled. He said that after paying for his tobacco and having the jug filled, he would not have any money left for foolishness. [Laughter.] To refuse to pay these adjusted-service certificates for the reasons usually given are as unfounded as was this man's reason why he could not afford the 50 cents for his wife. At each and every opportunity since coming to Congress I have voted to pay the so-called bonus. I believe it is an honest obligation of our Government, years overdue. Now it should be paid. The defenders of our flag, the defenders of our women and children, the defenders of our Nation are entitled to our support, and for a fair, honest settlement. The leaders of various veterans' organizations are to be congratulated for cooperating and joining as one group. The facts are that what is desired by veterans and their friends is payment of the so-called "bonus."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I am voting for passage of H. R. 9870, and I feel happy indeed that the time apparently has now arrived when the adjusted-service certificates of World War veterans will soon be redeemed by the Government and full cash paid for them. I have voted for the passage of this legislation ever since it has been before the Congress. We were able, as you know, to pass it in the House in 1932, 1933, 1934, and 1935. Each time I voted for it, because ever since I have been a Member of Congress I have believed that this debt due World War veterans should be paid. I cannot understand why there has been serious objection heretofore raised to its payment, because the bulk of the Army was composed of privates, and they received only a dollar or a little more per day for service while they were in the States and also while they were on foreign soil. At the same time they were receiving this meager pay to defend our Nation and defend democracy, people in industry in America were receiving high wages. The employee in the shipyard who manufactured the ship to transport the soldier and to bear naval arms, the man in the ammunition factory who manufactured ammunition to be used by the soldier, the man in the factory who manufactured clothing for him to wear, and in fact all classes of workers who supplied the soldier with the weapons of warfare were paid in some instances as high as twelve to fifteen dollars per day, while the man who held the gun and pulled the trigger drew about a dollar a day. Undoubtedly our Government has been and is now strong enough to add to this small amount another dollar or dollar and a quarter per day for these noble men who defended our country.

Payment of the adjusted-service certificates—bonus—at this time will stimulate the purchasing power and economic life of our entire Nation. It will be paid to soldiers in every county and every village in the United States. They, in turn, will use these funds for the purchase of supplies, for the payment of debts, for payment on homes, and for general commercial purposes. It will have a telling effect on the industrial life of our Nation at this time when retrenchment of Government expenditures in other departments is apparent.

According to tabulation of figures which I have recently obtained, the ex-service men in the State of Florida will obtain $21,921,858.79. Those in my congressional district will obtain $4,854,874.45. By counties in my congressional district they will obtain:

Alachua	$513,103.82
Baker	93,662.17
Bradford	140,426.06
Clay	102,411.73
Columbia	218,559.98
Dixie	95,842.09
Duval	2,321,815.30
Gilchrist	61,769.55
Hamilton	41,157.68
Lafayette	65,114.10
Levy	185,980.54
Madison	233,132.64
Nassau	139,978.13
Suwannee	234,879.57
Taylor	196,133.62
Union	110,907.47
Total	4,854,874.45

I repeat that I am happy indeed to have this opportunity to vote for full cash payment, and I feel that it will be only a short while before this bill will be written into a law and the checks are mailed to our worthy World War veterans. It will give me pleasure to speak further on the subject, but time will not permit. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I have discussed the matter of the immediate payment of the bonus on this floor on more than one occasion. Each and every time I expressed myself as favoring the necessary expenditure to liquidate the Government's obligation to the veteran.

There is nothing new that I shall add to my previous discourse because the same valid arguments expressed on previous occasions hold good today.

I have always been committed to the principle of cash and full payment of the so-called bonus, and I was not concerned so much as to the method of payment as I was and as I am today anxious to do justice by the veterans, most of whom are in need of financial assistance. I am happy to say that the friendly understanding between the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Legion, and the Disabled Veterans will be most helpful toward final payment of the bonus. The leaders of these organizations are to be congratulated.

The Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill is on its way.

I shall vote for its passage. Hoping that it will not be necessary, I shall nevertheless be prepared to override a Presidential veto; and when the method of payment is finally proposed and discussed I shall be very happy to vote for the Patman method of payment. I do not believe in the issuance of bonds.

If Members will refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, they will find that contrary to popular misconception and adverse propaganda against the Patman plan of payment, the plan is, in fact, not inflationary. Mr. PATMAN does not propose the payment of the bonus through the issuance of fiat or printing-press money. Mr. PATMAN has in mind securing such issue of currency by the Federal Government, either by the issuance of non-interest-bearing bonds which would be put into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury as security for such currency as might be paid to the veterans, or the substitution of the same amount of money now in circulation and issued by the Federal Reserve banks with a similar amount of bonus money.

Mr. PATMAN, moreover, points out that there is upward of $10,000,000,000 in gold and a fabulous amount of silver in the Treasury, much of it free and unattached by any obligation, which certainly could be used as a guaranty back of any issue used for the payment of the soldiers' bonus.

I have been consistent in both my attitude on the payment of the bonus and the method of such payment. There is not a capitalistic banker nor a so-called financial expert who can convince me as to the charged fallacy of the Patman plan.

I want to pay the bonus to the veterans as a matter of an obligation, as a matter of good business, as a matter of fairness, although I want to pay it free of any overhead.

I resent the payment of any bonus to undeserving bankers or any commissions which might be looked upon as "hush money" to satisfy them in order that they may no longer oppose the payment of the bonus.

I will fight the inclusion of any chiseler element from "horning in" on what belongs to the veterans and will, therefore, vote against any amendment favoring the bankers' method of payment. However, if the veterans' bonus payment be dependent upon at the same time a like amount being paid to the bankers, and the banker influence in this Congress being so strong as to deprive them of what is rightfully due, then I shall be obliged to go so far as to pay a pound of flesh to the bankers and, cost what it may, insist upon the veterans being paid their share in full.

The economic arguments in favor of payment of the soldiers' bonus have been threshed out on this floor too many times to need repetition. Since March of 1933 the country has felt the return of prosperity. The progress has been slow, to be sure, but that secure and consistent gains have been made cannot be denied. If and when the bonus is paid, I predict a further and greater impetus will be given to the return of prosperous times in this country.

I sincerely hope that the House will pass the measure which was submitted by my committee with such a smashing vote as to leave no doubt in the mind of anyone regarding the desire of Congress to pay this obligation. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL].

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, not having been a Member of the House at the time, I have not had the opportunity to support the bills for the payment of the adjusted certificate; but being in favor of this bill in its entirety, I ask unanimous consent that I may revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

BONUS

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, a number of gentlemen are Members of this House who were here when the soldier boys went to war.

When the call came to send them, I dare say not one of them said, "Wait a minute; let's see if we have the money to pay them."

They were ushered out as if that question would never arise. The bill has been vetoed by three Presidents, and during that time nothing was done about arranging to pay for it.

They sit idly by while the years roll along and wait until it comes back, and every time they say, "Where and how shall we pay?"

I venture to say should war be thrust suddenly upon us that we would find a way to finance it, and its finances would look like mountains beside this molehill out of which we are trying to make a mountain.

I note that every dilatory motion, amendment, and postponement has come from the Republican side of the House and from Members who represent districts where the few high and mighty rule the roost in their parts. They even propose to pay it from the present unexpended relief program and public-works program, thus to render it most objectionable to the most people when passed.

They want the soldier, when he does receive this small part of his just reward, to be censured by as many people as possible for asking for what is justly due him.

This has to be paid anyway not later than 1945, or 9 years hence, and at the low rate of interest the Government obtains money why not do it now. Some of the boys want it while they are living.

Some of the boys were mere children, scarcely 18, with the baby fat still on their cheeks, and some of the first set of teeth still in use, mere children in mind and body.

We fought a war with England and said taxation without representation is tyranny. But we send mere lads to war who are not voters and have no voice in the selection of men of this body who have power to declare war. Some of these left high schools and colleges and their educational careers were broken up. While gone, those at home had sharp advances in wages. A carpenter got $10 a day, while the boy who went away for a chance to be cannon fodder received a dollar a day. He left home ties—perhaps a wife or fiancée—sometimes the only son of parents to cheer their fireside.

When he paid his Government insurance and necessary incidentals he had left not exceeding 50 cents a day.

It was worth $10 a day to the Government for a man to drive nails and go home to his family at night, but worth only $1 a day for a man to stand at the front in uniform. There is something about it that needs adjusting.

In today's inquiry over in the Senate committee J. P. Morgan, on the witness stand, is made to disclose that he made $30,000,000 as purchasing agent for the Allies before we ever entered the war. As to how much he made after we entered the war would be hard to conjecture. What if it takes every dollar of war profit he made? If it took all such war profits it would be but just.

It has been pointed out here on this floor that the reserve of gold now in the Treasury is far more than enough to pay without any inflation whatever.

In 1945 the same objections made here today would be made then, and postponement and delay and harmful amendments would be offered by Members who represent 10 percent of our population who howl, squeal, and twist like pulling their eye teeth at every proposition made in the interest of the other 90 percent. All their wealth came from the other 90 percent. They never plowed or built or produced anything. They just manipulated and short-changed by extortion the masses on whom they flourished.

The question has to be settled some day, and the sooner the better. Today is a good day.

As a fundamental principle of fairness, I am eternally opposed to any compulsory service of an 18-year-old lad. If voluntary, then that is different; but a large portion of these lads were in that age.

If a man had two sons back in 1918 and one was educated during the war at his father's expense and his twin brother went to the front, the father would certainly make some allowance in his will for the son who failed to get that training which his brother had.

While public servants change, yet it is the same Uncle Sam, and he should now adjust this compensation between those who labored and those who fought in the World War, meager though it is and far from adjustment; in fact, it is a belated duty that every citizen owes. It will help pay doctors' bills, merchants' accounts, and interest on the home. The ex-service man is not the only one who will be benefited by this act. It is far-reaching.

My position is not new. I have openly advocated paying this just debt for 12 years. Today streamer headlines tell us of requests for huge sums for defense. Let us pay this little bill before we think of another. I am for adequate defense, but not for another war under any circumstances, unless we are actually invaded and being shot at and have to shoot back in self-defense of our homes. But I want the mothers of my district to know that if their bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked lads never die until I vote to send them away from home to be slaughtered by a foreign enemy that they will live to be older than Methuselah.

History of the immediate past shows our playing the big brother is often not appreciated by the beneficiary.

For three administrations following the war not a move was made to collect our debt from the Allies. Then came a time when ruin had struck their financial structure and they were unable to pay. Had that debt been collected, this little account of balance due presented to us would only be pocket change in amount.

Give us the strongest neutrality bill that can be offered; but the duty of man to man and one American citizen to another is to pay this bill and get it out of the way.

We paid Civil War claims and pensions mountain-high, just and unjust, until very recently, and no one representing the States in Congress where these objectors come from today ever protested them.

There is a vast difference between money spent by billions for foreign worthless securities, which our Government put a stop to in this administration, and money appropriated to home people to be spent at home and find its way back into the National Treasury in due course.

Let us meet the bill for service rendered with our ever-grateful thanks to the soldier boys at home for their gallant and faithful service. Not one single objector of the high-hat tribe would go out tomorrow and wear the uniform and do what these lads did for several times the price.

Our resources and credit today are the highest in the world, as evidenced by the bond issues of lowest rates of interest being oversubscribed.

I note with pleasure that destructive amendments intended to kill the bill were voted down by a solid vote of the majority side of this House.

If it were the law of the land in time of war to conscript wealth first and youth second, there would never be another war.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. COLDEN].

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Chairman, my convictions in favor of the payment of the adjusted certificates date back to my observations during the World War. I lived in a small city—San Pedro, Calif.—in which there were 15,000 or 20,000 shipbuilders, at the peak, engaged in the construction of ships. The minimum wage in those shipyards was about $5 per day. The average was much greater than that. I knew of many instances where men, by extra time, earned from $15 to $20 per day. They lived on the very best that the country could afford. The veteran who enlisted to serve his country and who was risking his health and his life and limbs received a very small compensation—a mere pittance. He left a profitable business or probably a very remunerative job; he made a sacrifice not only in serving his country and in offering his health and strength but he sacrificed his business. His financial sacrifice was considerable.

On the other hand, the railroads, big industries, and the ship contractors made fat profits and took no chances on the dangers of the firing line. After the war they put in immediate claims for adjusted compensation. They received prompt consideration and were paid billions. In the name of justice, how can any honest citizen, in the face of this payment, defend the delay and the injustice of the deferring of the veterans' adjusted compensation until 1945. The fair action would have been to have paid the veterans the cash and ask those who made big profits to do the waiting.

I think the veterans of the country should be commended in that they are willing to accept such a small amount, such a modest amount, in payment of the services that they rendered at the time of the World War. I think the bill should be supported by every friend of the veterans, and I shall do so and be very happy at the opportunity. I trust we will be able to work out the final payment authorized by this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I realize that at this late hour, after a full discussion of this important measure, nothing that I can say, possibly nothing that anyone could say, would change or affect in any way the vote that will be had on the bill tomorrow. The bill comes before the House without a dissenting vote in the Committee on Ways and Means. So far as I know, no member of that committee is opposed to the legislation. I believe this bill or similar legislation represents the overwhelming sentiment of a majority of the American people. I believe it is a just and a fair settlement, and under all the circumstances, considering the conditions under which the services were rendered, it is fair to the Government.

These veterans went abroad for the first time in the history of the country to fight our battles, upon the continent of Europe, and gave as splendid an account of themselves as soldiers as any in recorded history, while others at home were engaged in profitable business, or were receiving exorbitant salaries and wages. I think the settlement proposed in this bill is no more than fair. It is fair to the Government. It is a liberal settlement to those soldiers who have not borrowed on their certificates, and it is a generous settlement to those who have. Why should we not be liberal and generous to that class of our people who gave their best and offered their all in the service of their country, in the hour of its need and peril?

I am giving this bill my sincere and wholehearted support. I know some gentlemen are conscientiously opposed to this measure and with them I have no quarrel whatever. They have as good a right to their opinion as I have to mine, but inasmuch as the overwhelming sentiment of the people of the country favors the enactment of this legislation and the disposal of this issue, when the vote comes tomorrow I would be glad to see the bill pass by such an overwhelming majority.

I sincerely hope that our great humanitarian President may see his way clear to conscientiously give his support or his sanction to this measure.

I thank you. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] has expired.

All time has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended (U. S. C. '34 ed., title 38, ch. 11), the adjusted-service certificates issued under the authority of such act are hereby declared to be immediately payable. Payments on account of such certificates shall be made in the manner hereinafter provided upon application therefor to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and upon surrender of the certificates and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiaries thereof.) The payment in each case shall be in an amount equal to the face value of the certificate, except that if, at the time of application for payment under this act, the principal with respect to any loan upon any such certificate has not been paid in full by the veteran (whether or not the loan has matured), then, the Administrator shall (1) pay or discharge such unpaid principal in such amount as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this act, (2) deduct the same from the amount of the face value of the certificate, and (3) make payment in an amount equal to the difference between the face value of the certificate and the amount so deducted.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I do this at this time because in my previous statement today I said I would support a suggested amendment by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON], and another by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], the first with reference to refunding the interest, and the other with reference to taking care of veterans who might be taken off of relief if this bill passed without any amendment to that effect. However, in looking back to our agreement, the Patmanites, the Vinsonites, and the McCormackites, I think the agreement was to the effect that we would support the bill brought out by the Ways and Means Committee. I understand the bill was reported 24 to nothing. That is a unanimous report. So I think in keeping with that agreement, I will vote against any amendment which is offered, and I hope the other Members will also do so. [Applause.]

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CONNERY. I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Massachusetts is chairman of the Committee on Labor of the House. Several times this afternoon it was stated by Members on the floor of this House that the laborers who were back home and the people who were working at home were all receiving enormous wages. The gentleman is familiar with the subject. I should like to ask him whether it is not true that countless numbers of employees in offices and in stores, bookkeepers and stenographers and others were not getting enormous wages during the war.

Mr. CONNERY. Not only that, but I will say that the workers who were working—railroad workers, and other workers, for instance—were getting wages somewhat approximating what they ought to get, but the gentleman did not mention anything about the profiteers who were making millions and millions which they were not justly entitled to, while the men were fighting in France.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. The gentleman has just stated that he will vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO]. Does not the gentleman think it would be an injustice to the soldier to make the bonus relief money for him?

Mr. CONNERY. I will say to the gentleman, of course I do; but in order to get any bonus for the veteran we had to get this compromise in order to get a bill before the House and, as between this amendment which will be brought out and a bonus for the veteran, I am going to stay with the bonus.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman think that amendment will kill the bonus?

Mr. CONNERY. At least it is a violation of a gentlemen's agreement. I really was not personally bound to that, but technically it might be construed as a violation of a gentlemen's agreement. However, if the Senate puts it on and this House takes it and the committee takes it, when it comes back, my feelings will not be hurt at all.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. As a matter of fact, the gentleman does not believe this particular situation was in mind when the gentlemen's agreement was entered into, does he?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. This is the bill that was referred to.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I mean this question of taking the veterans off relief. I do not believe that question came up in the conference.

Mr. CONNERY. No; it did not; but this is the bill to which they referred. It had been taken out at that time. Mr. VINSON's original bill had it in, to take care of that.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Not the relief proposition.

Mr. CONNERY. No; no. That was the other thing. That was not considered in the conference.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Inasmuch as that was not considered at all in the conference, I cannot see how the gentleman is bound by that agreement.

Mr. CONNERY. We would be bound to the extent of standing by this bill as it came out of committee, because 25 or 50 or 60 other amendments might be offered.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does the gentleman believe it would hurt the bill?

Mr. CONNERY. Of course not.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. It is rather in the nature of a perfecting amendment.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. I should like to say that I was one of the parties to that agreement, and I certainly do not feel myself bound to do anything but give my most enthusiastic support to the Marcantonio amendment [applause] which I think is most important.

Mr. CONNERY. I have no quarrel with my friend from Minnesota if he feels that way. I feel differently.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from North Carolina.

A good many of the Members have left the Hall. Some of them I know have amendments they desire to offer to the bill. I think they left us with the idea in mind that we would not proceed with the general reading under the 5-minute rule this afternoon. I think it would be no more than courteous to our colleagues to rise at this time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. They have had ample warning. We are going on with this bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not want to raise the point of no quorum, but I think we should show this courtesy to our colleagues.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That is the gentleman's privilege. If I only knew what amendments were to be offered tomorrow, the situation would be different.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman move to rise at this time?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman will not.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Sixty-eight Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLANTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R.

9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 291 Members answered to their names, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. In the case of each loan heretofore made pursuant to law by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and/or by any national bank, or any bank or trust company incorporated under the laws of any State, Territory, possession, or the District of Columbia, upon the security of an adjusted-service certificate, any interest that has been or, in consequence of existing law, would be charged against the face value of such certificate either shall be canceled or not so charged, as the case may be, notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary. Any interest on any such loan payable to any such bank or trust company shall be paid by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

In the case of any such loan which is unpaid and held by a bank or trust company at the time of filing an application under this act, the bank or trust company holding the note and certificate shall, upon notice from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, present them to the Administrator for payment to the bank or trust company in full satisfaction of its claim for the amount of unpaid principal and unpaid interest, except that if the bank or trust company, after such notice, fails to present the certificate and note to the Administrator within 45 days after the mailing of the notice, such interest shall be paid only up to the forty-fifth day after the mailing of such notice.

SEC. 3. (a) An application under this act for payment of a certificate may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations shall be held void.

(b) If the veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made it shall be valid if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs finds that it bears the bona-fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefit of this act on behalf of the veteran, and is filed before the maturity of the certificate, whether or not the veteran is alive at the time it is filed. If the death occurs after the application is filed but before the receipt of the payment under this act, or if the application is filed after the death occurs but before mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, payment shall be made to the estate of the veteran irrespective of any beneficiary designation.

(c) Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application, disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of this act, has been filed before the maturity of the certificate, and the application cannot be found, such application shall be presumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed.

(d) In case application under this act for payment of any certificate is filed before April 6, 1937, payment shall be made by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs upon approval of the application. In case application for payment under this act is filed on or after April 6, 1937, payment shall be made on the 1st day of May, September, or January, whichever month first follows the date of filing the application, except that if payment on such application is made to the estate of the veteran pursuant to subsection (b), payment shall be made upon approval of the application.

(e) If at the time this act takes effect a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefor he shall be entitled, upon application made under section 302 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, to receive, at his option, under such rules and regulations as the Administrator may prescribe, either the certificate under section 501 of such act, as amended, or payment under this act.

SEC. 4. If an application under this act for payment of the certificate of any veteran is not made prior to maturity of the certificate or is not filed prior to April 6, 1937, interest shall accrue on such certificate at the rate of 3 percent per annum. Such interest shall be computed on a principal amount equal to the face value of the certificate less any indebtedness of the veteran on account of the principal of any loan or loans secured by such certificate. Such interest shall begin to accrue on the day after the date of enactment of this act, or the date of issuance of the certificate, whichever is the later date, and shall continue to accrue until January 1, 1945, death of the veteran, or payment of the certificate upon an application therefor under this act, whichever is the earliest date. The accrued interest shall be paid by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs upon payment of the certificate under this act or the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I endeavored to get the attention of the Chair when the Clerk finished reading section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to section 3. I endeavored to get the attention of the Chair to offer the amendment when the Clerk finished reading section 3.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. We object to going back, Mr. Chairman. I make the point of order that we have passed section 3.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

Mr. Chairman, I care not, and I do not know what the gentleman from Pennsylvania had, although I was sitting alongside of him. I saw the gentleman from Pennsylvania on his feet trying to get the attention of the Chair. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to his day in court no matter what he has to offer.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLANTON). The gentleman from Pennsylvania in rising stated that his purpose was to offer an amendment to section 3. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the point of order that we have passed section 3, and under the rules the Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I submitted my request before the Clerk started the reading of section 4. The Chair did not hear me and did not see me. I think the fault does not lie with me. I think the point of order is not well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the reason the Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania when he rose during the reading of section 4 was because the Clerk was about halfway through the reading of section 4; and, under the rules, the Chair was not permitted to recognize the gentleman until the Clerk had concluded reading section 4. The Chair recognized the gentleman as soon as the reading of section 4 was completed.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I was on my feet asking to be recognized before the Clerk started the reading of section 4.

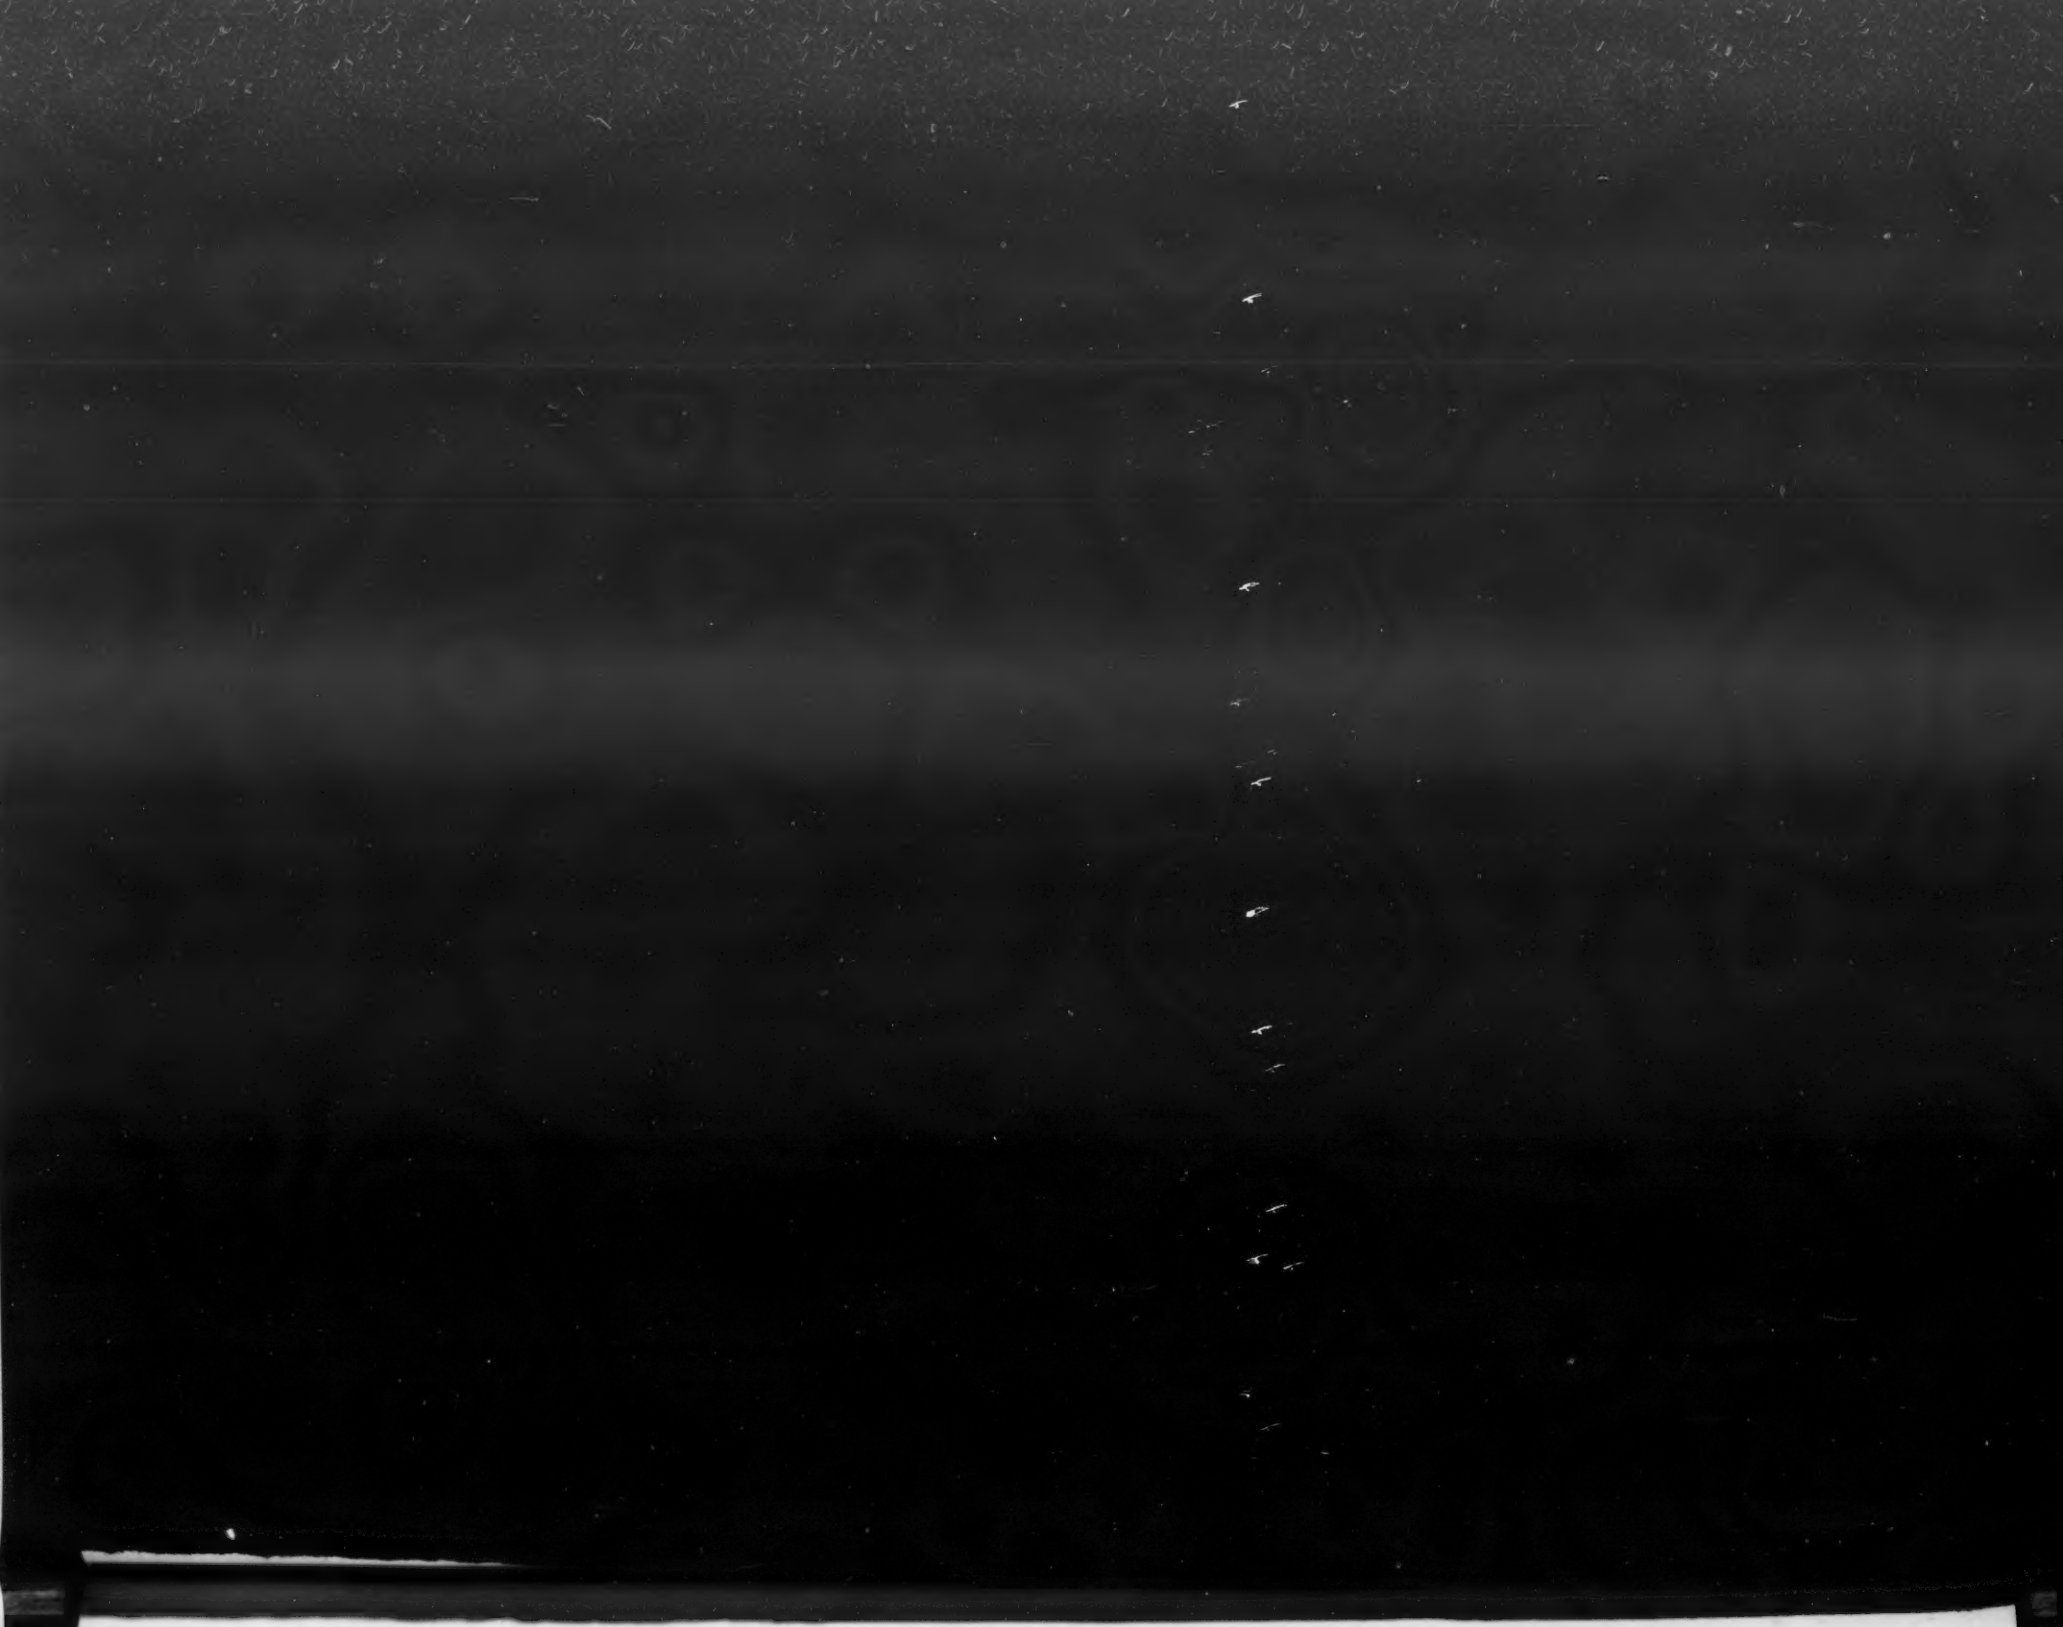
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand the situation. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] insist on his point of order?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in section 4.

Mr. Chairman, my only purpose in moving to strike out the last word in the section indicated is to inquire of the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee whether or not under the provisions of this bill those veterans who do not wish to cash or collect their adjusted-service certificates may be permitted to hold them in their present status and whether or not it is optional with the certificate holders in the matter of collection of these certificates?



Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. They are entitled to hold them. If they hold them until after April 6, 1937, they will draw interest at the rate of 3 percent per annum from the date of the enactment of the law until January 1, 1945, or until the death of the veteran.

Mr. MAY. What is to become of the question of accrued interest?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is waived.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment that I desired to offer was with reference to section 3, line 13, page 4. Under the bill as it is now written the money which may be paid to the estate of a deceased veteran might be subject to State and Federal inheritance taxes. Some of the States have a very low exemption. The amendment I intended to offer simply provided that in the event of such payment being made to the estate of a deceased veteran it shall not be subject to any State or Federal inheritance tax. I did not desire to offer any argument in support of the amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. I gladly yield to the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Section 308 of the Adjusted Service Certificate Act takes care of the very matter in which the gentleman is so interested.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. But this is an amendment to the act, and I did not know whether that section would cover it. It is doubtful.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. This is an amendment of the Adjusted Service Certificate Act.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. What is the language of that section?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The language is as follows:

No sum payable under this act to a veteran or his dependents, or to his estate, or to any beneficiary named under title V, no adjusted-service certificate, and no proceeds of any loan made on such certificate shall be subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process, or to National or State taxation, and no deductions on account of any indebtedness of the veteran to the United States shall be made from the adjusted-service credit or from any amounts due under this act.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. My amendment refers to a payment made to an estate and not to the veteran.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The section I read covers all of the payments.

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. It is doubtful whether that section would take care of it.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to redeem from the United States Government life-insurance fund all adjusted-service certificates held by that fund on account of loans made thereon, and to pay to the United States Government life-insurance fund the amount of the outstanding liens against such certificates, including all interest due or accrued, together with such amounts as may be due under subdivision (m) of section 502 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make such payment by issuing, to the United States Government life-insurance fund, bonds of the United States which shall bear interest at the rate of 4½ percent per annum. No such bonds shall mature or be callable until the expiration of a period of at least 10 years from date of issue, except that any such bond shall be redeemed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the principal and accrued interest thereon paid to the United States Government life-insurance fund at any time upon certification by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs that the amount represented by such bond is required to meet current liabilities. Bonds issued for the purposes of this section shall be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, subject to the provisions of this section.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to consume at this late hour the full amount of time that is allotted to me under the rule. I shall merely state at the outset that I have been for the bonus since I came to Congress. I hope that the Patman form of paying this bonus will be the one that will be finally triumphant.

My main purpose in rising is to call the attention of the Members of Congress to the fact that when the bonus was first presented to Congress many years back it was just as much laughed at, scoffed at, and sneered upon as an adequate pension measure is today. I feel confident that since that time the character, the disposition, and the economic philosophy of the Congress has changed. Fortunately or unfortunately the membership of the body has changed; I may say fortunately for the veterans. Today we have an issue before the Nation that will likewise change the membership of this Congress unless the membership realizes the trend toward adequate pensions and changes to that end before it is too late.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to detain the Committee further in its consideration of this measure. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have incorporated as a part of my remarks a letter which I addressed several weeks ago to the State commander of the American Legion in West Virginia and the State commander of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, Mr. Rex. Davis, setting forth my views upon the question of the payment of adjusted-service certificates; also to include the benefits which will accrue to the veterans of West Virginia including the 15 counties in my Congressional District, as well as a very short excerpt from Arthur Brisbane upon the preferential method of payment, in which I am a strong believer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The letter I refer to is as follows:

DECEMBER 18, 1935.

Hon. WILLIAM G. STATHERS,
State Commander American Legion,
Clarksburg, W. Va.

MY DEAR BILL: At the forthcoming session of the Seventy-Fourth Congress we will again be considering legislation calling for the payment of the adjusted-service certificates to veterans of the World War. I feel that this debt should be paid now, and you and the other members of your splendid organization may be assured that I shall exert every effort in behalf of immediate payment.

I feel that this is a most opportune time for settlement. Payment should be a real stimulant to business, and it is right and proper that this obligation be met now and not later.

Very sincerely yours,

JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

The following is the amount, by counties, of benefits to veterans of the World War within West Virginia:

The following comment is from that distinguished journalist, Arthur Brisbane:

You are warned that all plans to balance the National Budget will be upset if it becomes necessary to pay the soldiers' bonus to avoid trouble in the 1936 election.

If the bonus must be paid, taxes must be increased.

Why must they be increased?

If the Government had brains enough to pay the bonus with new money made, it need not tax anything or anybody. But, if it insists on putting out more interest-bearing "fiat bonds", not worth 1 cent a ton more than greenbacks, since both represent only the Government's promise to pay, then, of course, there will be more taxes to pay additional interest on more of the idiotic fiat bonds. Your bonds are mere fiat paper money. Why, in Heaven's name, insist on paying interest?

You would hardly have patience with a microcephalic idiot if he insisted on piling up a load of bond interest when it could as well be avoided. Does anybody think it would hurt this country to print the money that would be needed to pay soldiers their bonus? Let them spend it, and let the country make a profit by it without injecting the pawnbroker interest-bearing complex into the situation.

The issue before us tonight should be settled finally in this session of Congress. It should be taken out of politics now. The money paid to these veterans is a just debt to those men who defended this Republic in a critical period of our history. These men will pay old debts, remodel and repair their homes, and purchase goods which will stimulate business and aid returning prosperity.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. Amounts in the adjusted-service certificate fund are hereby authorized to be appropriated and made immediately available to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs for making payments authorized to be made by this act. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall from time to time advise the Secretary of the Treasury as to the amount of funds necessary to make such payments.

SEC. 7. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

Mr. FISH and Mr. WHITTINGTON rose.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I was trying to get recognition when the Clerk finished the reading of section 6. I was on my feet at the time.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer to section 7.

The CHAIRMAN. In view of the fact there are only three lines in section 7, and the gentleman from New York was on his feet seeking recognition, the Chair thinks the gentleman from New York should be recognized and, without objection, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York to offer an amendment to section 6.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. That will be done without prejudice to my offering an amendment to section 7?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. The amendment is to section 6.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 7, line 13, add section 6A, as follows:

"The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to make the exchange stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 that expires on January 30, 1936, available on that date for payment of the adjusted-service certificates."

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to this section or to any part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York on the point of order.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, the bill reads, "To provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates", and my amendment offers a method for the payment of these certificates. This is one of the many means that may be proposed for the payment of these certificates, and I should think there would be the greatest amount of latitude by the Chair for any Member to offer a specific way of paying the certificates.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLANTON). The bill is merely an authorization for an appropriation. The Chair thinks that a reading of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York clearly shows that the amendment is an appropriation, and not proper on this bill, and the Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to section 7.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, section 7, as I understand, has not been read.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes; it has been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again read section 7.

The Clerk read section 7.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. TREADWAY: Page 7, line 13, after the word "appropriated", insert "out of any unexpended balances heretofore appropriated or made available for emergency purposes."

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not definite enough. It does not specify what law or what appropriation is intended to be covered by the proposed amendment.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the further point of order that it is an appropriation.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to conclude, as I understand the gentleman's amendment, he proposes to pay this amount or whatever amount is necessary to carry out the provisions of the act from the relief appropriation. I may say that my objection to the gentleman's amendment is to the form rather than the substance. I have sent to the Clerk's desk an amendment proposing to pay it out of the Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, describing it definitely, and I believe the gentleman's amendment is too indefinite.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLANTON). The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think it necessary to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts unless the gentleman seeks to convince the Chair that the Chair would be in error in holding his amendment in order.

While it is restrictive and limits Congress to just one source in making its appropriation, while the bill in no way limits, the amendment is merely an authorization. It will require action on the part of Congress later to appropriate the money, and the Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, we have reached the point where it is pretty definitely understood that in some way or other this bonus matter will be cleared up. It seems to be quite definitely understood from the debate here today that there will not be extensive opposition to the bill when it comes to a vote tomorrow. Of course, many Members will vote against it, but nevertheless it is expected that it will be finally passed. The point now is, How are you going to meet the bill? We find on reference to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury that there is $6,595,150,742.05 unexpended out of the relief emergency appropriations. We appropriated in one bill $4,800,000,000. We cannot separate that on the sheet provided by the Treasury Department, but the Treasury Department does say that over $6,000,000,000 is unexpended. My amendment is simply to allocate a certain portion of that $6,000,000,000 unexpended balance for the purpose of paying off the bonus bill, which will run from two to three billion dollars. That is the purpose of the amendment which the Chair has held in order, and it is a sensible way for this House to state its view as to the payment of the bonus. It will do away with any possibility of inflation of the currency. It will do away with any addition of $2,000,000,000 to the public debt, which debt has already reached the fabulous sum of thirty and one-half billion dollars.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does the gentleman realize that while that money is unexpended it has been allocated to projects which are now in course of construction and the money will be needed for that purpose?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, the gentleman is in error there. There are millions upon millions of dollars that have not been allocated. There is $437,000,000 in one item alone, and plenty to more than make up the needed amount. There is no question about the money being available. Why we should continue to have $6,000,000,000 unused money lying idle, I for one cannot say. It is not good business. It is not common sense. It is profligacy. At least $4,000,000,000 out of the $6,500,000,000 has not been obligated, and where allocated has been allocated for such foolish projects as the Resettlement Administration. This amendment would give us an opportunity to stop a huge waste of public money, as the New Deal administration has continuously demonstrated these expenditures are. Further, it would obviate any new tax to pay the bonus which seems inevitable unless this amendment is adopted.

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. BOLTON. I wish to call the attention of the gentlemen and of the House to a statement of the Treasury of June 29, 1935, in which it is stated that the total emergency expenditures for the fiscal year 1935, amounted to three-billion-six-hundred-million-and-odd dollars, and the total expenditures for emergency purposes for 1934 amounted to about four billion. We are told that the emergency requests and needs are less this fiscal year than they have been in the past. The statement of January 7, 1936, also shows that up to the 7th of January there has been expended for emergency purposes approximately $1,980,000,000, leaving, if we do not go over the figures of 1935, approximately $1,600,000,000 still to be provided out of the unexpended balance, six and a half billion of emergency funds which the Treasury statement shows there is today, that would leave us, taking that out, practically $5,000,000,000, from which the two billion for the bonus can be paid and the remainder of the projects carried on.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio is a member of the Committee on Appropriations and knows the figures.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The purpose, and doubtless the effect of this amendment is to break up the entire relief scheme that is now in progress by the administration. This Congress passed relief legislation and the amount that is authorized to be appropriated has been allocated to projects all over the country, to good roads, to school buildings, and various projects, whereby the unemployed of the Nation can be given employment, and, moreover, some of the States have already gone ahead of the local communities and counties and arranged for funds to match a large portion of this fund.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Can the gentleman indicate where these unexpended balances are likely to be spent for relief? Why are they not in here? In other words, for what purpose should we add to the indebtedness of the Nation today to pay the soldiers' bonus when the money is available and can be so used?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman knows it is impossible to give a list of all of the projects that are under way and that have been approved. There is no doubt that the entire purpose of the gentleman's amendment is to break up the relief scheme. That is all it amounts to, and I ask that it be voted down.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] claims there is an unexpended balance of $6,000,000,000, and on that basis he introduced his amendment that the bonus certificates should be paid out of the six-billion unexpended and unobligated balance. In the last session of Congress I made a somewhat similar motion to pay the certificates out of the $4,000,000,000 of public-works funds, but if there are $6,000,000,000 unexpended, and I am inclined to think the gentleman is about right, from the figures that have been given me this afternoon, some of it possibly having been allocated or earmarked, then there is certainly more than enough money that has not been either allocated, earmarked, or obligated available now. I have also pointed out that there is a secret stabilization fund of $2,000,000,000 that expires on the 30th of this month unless the President extends it for 1 year in case of emergency.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Certainly; yes.

Mr. DOUGHTON. On what authority does the gentleman make the statement that this money has not been allocated?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD the figures showing what has been allocated and what has not been allocated. I have the figures specifically stated right there.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Why does not the gentleman give the committee the benefit of it?

Mr. FISH. I do not have time to read the figures in the balance of my time.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Where are the figures from?

Mr. FISH. The total amount that I have here is $3,374,000,000.

Mr. COX. That has not been allocated?

Mr. FISH. That is correct.

Mr. DOUGHTON. From what is the gentleman reading?

Mr. COCHRAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want to know where the gentleman received his information to the effect that only the amount he named has been allocated or earmarked?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, I object to the gentleman's request.

Mr. COCHRAN. I reserve the right to object. I think it is valuable that we get this information, because I know the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. FISH. Objection has been made and I cannot put these figures in the RECORD except through extension of my remarks. All I can say is that my secretary, at my direction, got the figures today from the different departments of the Government and presumably they are correct and authentic.

Now there seems to be some dispute as to how much money has been allocated and how much has not. We cannot decide it the way we are proceeding this evening, but I can say for myself and for a great many Republicans to whom I have spoken, that if this bill is passed to pay the veterans' certificates and is vetoed by the President, and he comes back here and asks for $2,000,000,000 in increased taxes, there will be many Republicans who will not vote for one single dollar of increased taxes to pay these adjusted-service certificates, because of the unexpended balances and unobligated moneys, and because there is $2,000,000,000 more in the secret stabilization fund that will be likewise available on January 30, 1936. In accordance with my request to revise and extend my remarks, I append the data compiled by my secretary under my direction, regarding the expenditure of the $4,000,000,000 public-works fund.

RE PUBLIC-WORKS FUND

Out of the $4,000,000,000 public-works fund, made available under the Works Relief Act of April 8, 1935, according to the statement of the Treasury, dated January 7, 1936, the following funds were allocated, and the balance at right shows funds credited or allocated by the President but unexpended:

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro-forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand the daily statement of the United States Treasury dated January 7, 1936. On page 4 of this document there is a heading, "Funds appropriated and allocated for recovery and relief, and expenditures therefrom and unexpended balances as of January 7, 1936."

In the column under "Unexpended" we have "Unallocated funds by the President, $78,000,000" plus; "By Public Works Administration, $13,000,000" plus; or a total of $91,000,000.

Mr. BOLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BOLTON. The gentleman knows perfectly well that "unallocated" and "unobligated" are entirely different. We know of many instances where allocated funds have been transferred within the past 6 months.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. But I cannot think for a split second that the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOLTON], chairman of the Republican congressional committee, would not recognize an obligation upon a solemn allocation for projects throughout the country. Now, let me say this: This is one of the amendments to which I directed your attention when I first took the floor this afternoon. This is an amendment that does not enlarge the power of appropriation. It is an amendment limiting the appropriation because all we could look to would be emergency funds. If you will read that amendment carefully, you will find it speaks of appropriating unexpended balances out of appropriations that have been made for emergency purposes. In other words, it is a limitation rather than an enlargement of the power of appropriation.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Is this not simply another way of defeating and preventing the payment of the adjusted-service certificates? [Applause.]

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes. In other words, there may be unexpended balances in the general fund. If there were, under this amendment you could not use those unexpended balances. I say to my friends in the House that this matter can be taken care of. If unexpended balances are desired to be used when the appropriation is made, let it be a regular appropriation and the right to use unexpended balances, and there will not be a limitation that will destroy the very purposes of this act.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. If an allocation is such a sacred thing, how does it happen that the administration has withdrawn and changed its own allocations from time to time?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It may be that the gentleman from Minnesota was so persuasive when he appeared before the P. W. A. that he caused them to make an allocation that was unjustified, and upon reflection, after that power of persuasion had been withdrawn, they may have seen the light and changed the allocation.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I claim no such power of persuasion, nor have I sought to exercise it; but if the President can change his own allocations, I see no reason why allocations are so sacred that Congress cannot change them.

Let me add that like many other Members who have voted against full cash payment of the bonus in the past, I shall support this measure if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] is adopted. I understand that if it fails he will embody it in a motion to recommit, and that on tomorrow we shall have an opportunity to go on record on the question whether the bonus certificates shall be paid out of allocated but unobligated funds already appropriated or whether another burden of $2,000,000,000 shall be placed on the backs of the American people. If the additional two billion is raised by issuing bonds, there will be more interest, and consequently more taxes to pay, and a further drain on the buying power of the people. If raised by issuing greenbacks, there will be an equal or even greater drain upon buying power; for if the history of the consequences of the issuance of $600,000,000 of paper money during the Civil War is repeated, there will be enough inflation to impair seriously the value of the already devalued dollar.

I have always in the past contended that the bonus certificates should be paid on the basis of their accrued value, with adjustment of interest on loans to the rate at which the certificates were computed. If that basis of settlement were adopted, the holders would get every cent the bargain made in 1924 called for. It would be just to the former service men and to the people generally. But I am willing to go further in order to close the books. I am willing to vote to pay at once what will not be due under the terms of the contract until 1945, with 10 years of interest not yet earned, if payment can be made out of funds already appropriated and unspent, which, if not used to settle this obligation, will be frittered away in further "boondoggling", which gives only $1 in relief to the unemployed for $3 collected from the people of the country.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been exhausted on this amendment.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TREADWAY) there were ayes 48 and noes 116.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Mr. TREADWAY and Mr. DOUGHTON to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were ayes 43 and noes 118.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WHITTINGTON: Page 7, line 15, strike out the period, insert a colon, and add: "Provided, That all unexpended and unallocated balances of the amounts appropriated under the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935 shall be made immediately available, and shall first be used and expended to carry out the provisions of this act."

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, just this word in explanation of the amendment, and I shall not detain the Committee: The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], which has just been rejected by the Committee, provided that the amount necessary to carry out the provisions of this act should be made available from relief funds heretofore appropriated.

My objection to that amendment is that if there were not sufficient of those funds unobligated and unappropriated there would result no appropriation or authorization to carry out this bill.

During the consideration of the so-called Patman and Vinson bills in the first session of this Congress I gave notice that if the Vinson bill were finally voted upon by the Committee that I would propose that the amounts necessary to carry out the provisions of that act be made available out of the relief appropriation of $4,800,000,000. The amendment I have just proposed, and which has just been read, provides first of all that the amounts necessary to carry out the provisions of this act shall be paid from the unobligated and unexpended balances appropriated under the $4,800,000,000 public-works bill last year. If this amount is not sufficient, then there would be an authorization for the remainder.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MARCANTONIO: Page 7, after line 15, add the following new section:

"SEC. —. No Federal agency shall in any manner or by any means deduct the amount of compensation received by any veteran pursuant to the provisions of this act, from any sum payable to him in whole or in part from Federal funds for work relief or other type of unemployment relief, nor shall such agency in any other manner alter the status of such recipient of compensation pursuant to the provisions of this act."

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, the Chair has just ruled that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], to pay the bonus from relief appropriations, was in order. My amendment is just the opposite. My amendment prevents payment of these adjusted-service certificates by means of relief funds. Why is my amendment not in order? Furthermore, my amendment defines the purpose, the scope, and the effect of the compensation authorized under this bill. I urge, consequently, that my amendment is germane.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLANTON). The Chair is ready to rule.

The bill before the Committee does not deal with relief agencies or with other agencies of the Government. The amendment of the gentleman from New York does deal with these agencies. The Chair holds, therefore, that the amendment is not germane to the bill and is out of order.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 9. This act may be cited as the "Adjusted Compensation Payment Act, 1936."

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly, the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BLANTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9870) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 388, he reported the same back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered on the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TREADWAY moves to recommit the bill H. R. 9870 to the Committee on Ways and Means with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment:

Page 7, line 13, after the word "appropriated", insert the following: "out of any unexpended balances heretofore appropriated or made available for emergency purposes."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

OUR UNION—IT MUST BE PRESERVED, NOT FOR THE FEW BUT FOR THE MANY

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech I made in Arlington, Va., to the Young Democratic Club last evening.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, under permission given to extend my remarks I include a speech delivered at the Jackson Day dinner, January 8, 1936, given under the auspices of the Young Democratic Clubs of Arlington County, Arlington, Va., as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I appreciate this opportunity of addressing such a large gathering on this important occasion given in honor of the President of the United States and the Democratic Party of Arlington County, Va.

One hundred and twenty-one years ago tonight the Nation celebrated the well-earned victory of the Battle of New Orleans. Thirteen years later General and Mrs. Jackson and their friends were invited to New Orleans to attend the first big celebration given there in their honor. Beginning in 1852 and each year thereafter there has been held throughout the Nation Jackson Day banquets in honor of the great statesman.

Conditions confronting the Nation when General Jackson was first inaugurated President on March 4, 1829, were very similar to those confronting the Nation when this administration came into power. The "money changers" had control of the temple; the manufacturers of the northern States had succeeded in passing protective tariffs for their so-called "infant industries" which had greatly benefited them to the detriment of the South. The Bank of the United States, chartered in 1816, had grown until it commanded a powerful political influence in the Nation. Under the leadership of John Marshall, the Supreme Court had rendered a series of decisions restricting the powers of the States and opened the floodgates for expansion of national functions and activities.

General Jackson was recognized as a champion of the rights of the common people, and at the time of his inauguration little was known as to his position on the important national questions pending. He soon left little doubt as to the course he would pursue. Soon after his inauguration he began to fight the money changers, and this battle he continued throughout his administration. Because of existing recent Supreme Court decisions, then as now, great constitutional questions were involved. These are some of the big questions raised and unsolved then as now:

What is the true character of the Constitution and the Union established under it? Are the States sovereign? Who should determine the limits of State and Federal power? What remedies have a State against unconstitutional measures of the National Government? Who should say when an act is unconstitutional? Some of these questions still remain unanswered.

WHAT NEW DEAL LEGISLATION HAS DONE

The recent decisions of the Supreme Court, and particularly their decision declaring A. A. A. invalid, has made us realize that if the Congress cannot enact legislation which through two and one-half years of trial has proven helpful to the general welfare of the Nation, then what course shall the people pursue if such decisions of the Supreme Court shall stand unchallenged.

Let me compare for you some of the prices received by the farmers at the beginning of this administration as compared to the prices they received December 15, 1935. These facts speak for themselves.

WHAT REPUBLICANISM DOES TO A COUNTRY

The three preceding Republican administrations, because of their enactment of special privileged laws favoring the wealthy against the rights of the common people, while they were enacting such special privileged legislation such as the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act and the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act, both of which revised our tariff laws upward and caused us the loss of most of our foreign trade, directly brought about the calamity confronting us at the beginning of this administration of want, misery, poverty, and unemployment. Factories closed, commerce and industry idle, and many millions of people losing their farms and homes and roaming the country unable to find work; thousands of bank failures, losing millions to the depositors, which immediately forced the President to close all banks in order to reorganize on a safe and sound basis.

DEMOCRACY TO THE RESCUE

You will remember that we were immediately called into a special session to try to remedy the results brought about by the wrecking crew of rugged individualism and the "raw deal", who had been in charge of our country for 12 years carrying out such a program. Bank legislation was immediately enacted taking care of that situation, so that the banks could reopen on a safe and sound basis, with the depositor's money amply protected. Next legislation for the benefit of the farm and home owners, suffering from high interest rates and foreclosures, was speedily enacted into law. Remedial legislation for the benefit of labor and working conditions in general was worked out. No administration ever worked harder and had the almost unanimous cooperation of both Houses of the Congress than had this administration during the early days of its session, when it was so well recognized that revolution was just around the corner. No sooner had legislation been worked out for the financial institutions and the manufacturing concerns of the Nation than they began to start their unjust and untrue criticism of this administration, as they did in the days of Jackson's administration—the money lenders, as soon as they were saved, began to rock the boat.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

The President in his admirable message to the joint session of Congress on January 3, every word of which I heartily endorse, correctly stated the case thus:

"We have returned the control of the Federal Government to the city of Washington. To be sure, in so doing we have invited battle. We have earned the hatred of entrenched greed. The very nature of the problem that we faced made it necessary to drive some people from power and strictly to regulate others. I made that plain when I took the oath of office in March 1933. I spoke of the practices of the unscrupulous money changers who stood indicted in the court of public opinion. I spoke of the rulers of the exchanges of mankind's goods, who failed through their own stubbornness and their own incompetence. I said that they had admitted their failure and had abdicated. Abdicated? Yes, in 1933; but now, with the passing of danger, they forget their damaging admissions and withdraw their abdication. They offer; they seek—let us put it that way—the restoration of their selfish power."

Further in his speech, in challenging our reactionary critics to state in clear terms their program, if any, the President issued this challenge, which so far has not been accepted:

"In other words, let action be positive and not negative. The way is open in the Congress of the United States for an expression of opinion by yeas and nays. Shall we say that values are restored and that the Congress will, therefore, repeal the laws under which we have been bringing them back? Shall we say that because national income has grown with rising prosperity we shall repeal existing taxes and thereby put off the day of approaching a balanced Budget and of starting to reduce the national debt? Shall we abandon the reasonable support and regulation of banking? Shall we restore the dollar to its former gold content? Shall we say to the farmer, 'The prices for your products are, in part, restored, now go and hoe your own row'? Shall we say to the home owners, 'We have reduced your rates of interest, we have no further concern with how you keep your home or what you pay for your money; that is your affair'? Shall we say to the several millions of unemployed citizens who face the very problem of existence—yes; of getting enough to eat—'We will withdraw from giving you work; we will turn you back to the charity of your communities and to those men of selfish power who tell you that perhaps they will employ you if the Government leaves them strictly alone'? Shall we say to the needy unemployed, 'Your problem is a local one, except that perhaps the Federal Government, as an act of mere generosity, will be willing to pay to your city or to your county a few grudging dollars to help maintain your soup kitchens'? Shall we say to the children who have worked all day in the factory, 'Child labor is a local issue and so are your starvation wages; something to be solved or left unsolved by the jurisdictions of 48 States'? Shall we say to the laborer, 'Your right to organize, your relations with your employer, have nothing to do with the public interest; if your employer will not even meet with you to discuss your problems and his, that is none of our affair'? Shall we say to the unemployed and the aged, 'Social security lies not within the province of the Federal Government; you must seek relief elsewhere'? Shall we say to the men and women who live in conditions of squalor in country and in city, 'The health and the happiness of you and your children are no concern of ours'? Shall we expose our population once more by the repeal of laws to protect them against the loss of their honest investments and against the manipulations of dishonest speculators? Shall we abandon the splendid efforts of the Federal Government to raise the health standards of the Nation and to give youth a decent opportunity through such means as the Civilian Conservation Corps? Members of Congress, let these challenges be met. If this is what these gentlemen want, let them say so to the Congress of the United States. Let them no longer hide their dissent in a cowardly cloak of generality. Let them define the issue. We have been specific in our affirmative action. Let them be specific in their negative attack."

All our reactionary critics—the 4 percent who own 90 percent of the wealth of the Nation—all they have ever had to offer us, in the words of the President: "They offer to lead us back round the same old corner into the same old dreary street."

IT IS RESULTS THAT COUNT

A careful analysis of the constructive program above mentioned worked out by this administration and enacted into law clearly shows that we are well on our road to recovery. You can turn to the market reports of any newspaper and it will show that almost all stocks are hitting new highs and business generally is enjoying the best year it has had in many years, even better than the peak days in 1929; yet many of these same newspapers carry willful and malicious, unfair and untrue editorials criticising the work of this administration. I hold in my hand several different newspapers telling of the great progress that has been made during the past 3 years. Reading from them we find that the farmers' cash income has increased 86 percent; rural retail sales have advanced 95 percent since the spring of 1933. General Motors has just cut a holiday bonus of $5,000,000 for 200,000 employees, and many other corporations have done likewise. The United States exports in November were 22 percent larger than in October and 38 percent larger than in November of last year. In New England business volume was from 10 to 15 percent above last fall. December retail sales ran nearly one-half billion dollars above December 1934 and a billion dollars above December 1933. November building construction was 89 percent better than November of last year and residential construction was up 129 percent over last year. The number of jobs filled by workers rose in the year from 38,700,000 to over 40,000,000; wages and salaries rose correspondingly. Stock dividends increased about $250,000,000, and the value of stocks held by investors rose eleven billions. People with savings deposits possess about a billion dollars more than last year. Yes; truly we are definitely on our way out, unless we may be stopped by the A. A. A. and similar political decisions of the Supreme Court.

I don't know what your reaction is to these two great opinions on A. A. A., the majority and minority opinions. As for me, I heartily concur in the sentiment expressed in the minority opinion where they said: "So may judicial power be abused. * * * The only check upon our own exercise of power is our own sense of self-restraint. For the removal of unwise laws from the statute books appeal lies not to the courts but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government."

CLAPPER RINGS THE BELL

Regarding the majority political opinion, I heartily agree with the statement of Mr. Raymond Clapper, staff correspondent for the Washington Daily News, on January 7, when he said:

"The Supreme Court gave plain warning in its high-handed scrapping of A. A. A. that other New Deal measures are to be mowed down as soon as it can get around to the grim business. That is, as soon as it can find the technical legal pretexts to support its political opinions.

"This leaves President Roosevelt free to do one of two things. He can resign himself to the Court's verdict as the final word of divine inspiration. He can accept the Court as the governing oligarchy of the country. He can yield to its political philosophy which would confine the Federal Government largely to running the Army, the Navy, and municipal affairs in the District of Columbia.

"Or he can accept the challenge as a political one, which it is, and go to the country to determine whether the people want to be governed by their elected President and their elected Congress or by a lame-duck judicial dictatorship."

Further, in speaking of the high-handed tactics of the Court, Mr. Clapper said:

"There is no use being dainty any longer in discussing the Court. It is in politics up to its neck. It can no longer claim the immunity from political discussion which a purely judicial body properly enjoys. Since it is vetoing acts of Congress right and left, it is no more immune from discussion than the President is immune when he vetoes an act of Congress.

"That this country, which presumably believes in the democratic form of government, will permit itself to be governed by a judicial oligarchy is incredible."

Further commenting upon the unfairness of this decision, Mr. Clapper said:

"They are the men who have said that the Government, after failing in every other attempt to restore the equilibrium of farm prices, shall not continue with the one method which in a trial of 2½ years has greatly alleviated the situation. These six men tell us we can't do it. They get away with it because John Marshall, while engaged in a desperate political battle with Jefferson, did. Nothing in the Constitution says they can."

BACK TO THE CONSTITUTION

We have heard much of late from our reactionary critics regarding recent decisions of the Supreme Court affecting legislation of this administration. It seems to me that we should join with our critics in urging an early return to the Constitution, and this I am glad to do, but from an entirely different angle. I would suggest that the Members of the Supreme Court read that great document and interpret it in the light under which it was written. If and when they do this they will find that our forefathers in the Constitutional Convention held in 1787 four times, or on four different occasions, refused to adopt a resolution that would have given the Supreme Court the right to declare acts of Congress invalid. (See Reports of Federal Convention, by James Madison, pp. 51, 406-407, and 475.) The last statement on this subject in said record, at page 475, written by Madison himself, reads: "It was generally supposed that the jurisdiction given (Supreme Court) was constructively limited to cases of a judicial nature."

Madison and others further argued that the Constitution did not grant the right to the Supreme Court to declare acts of Congress invalid. In regard to this question, James Madison said:

"I beg to know upon what principle it can be contended that any one department draws from the Constitution greater powers than another in marking out the limits of the powers of the several departments. Nothing has yet been offered to invalidate the doctrines that the meaning of the Constitution may as well be ascertained by the legislative as by the judicial authority."

Mr. Jefferson wrote Mrs. Adams on September 11, 1804:

"The opinion which gives to the judges the right to decide what laws are constitutional and what not, not only for themselves in their own sphere of action but for the legislature and Executive also in their spheres, would make the judiciary a despotic branch."

Further Thomas Jefferson wrote to Mr. Johnson on June 12, 1823, discussing this same question. He said:

"There must be an ultimate arbiter somewhere. True, there must; but does that prove it is either the Congress or the Supreme Court? The ultimate arbiter is the people of the Union, assembled by their deputies in convention at the call of Congress or of two-thirds of the States."

Many eminent statesmen in discussing this question have made similar statements. Nowhere in the Constitution is there found expressed power giving the Supreme Court the right to declare acts of Congress invalid. This power was usurped by John Marshall in the early days in the case of Marberry v. Madison, and this decision followed down to date. Our forefathers carefully weighed the checks and balances and specifically decided against allowing the members of a court appointed for life to have any such arbitrary and unlimited power. They thought it best to leave this power in the hands of the people, who by their ballot have the right to change their representatives each 2 years should they enact laws detrimental to the general welfare. So let's join with our critics and urge that we return to the Constitution and that legislation be enacted that will clearly define their jurisdiction and will require the Supreme Court to follow the Constitution as it is written.

In conclusion, let me urge you to become active in your support of this administration. No one has worked more assiduously than they to overcome the greatest panic in which we have ever found ourselves. The issue is clear-cut; the record made by this administration speaks for itself. We have made good progress all along the front. For the first time in many years human rights have been considered more important than property rights. We cannot afford to beat a retreat; let us continue to beat a charge; let us have life more abundant.

THOUGHTS ON "CASH AND CARRY" NEUTRALITY

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, perhaps no single suggestion on neutrality has so caught the fancy of the popular mind as has that of forcing all belligerents to come here for their war needs in their own ships or ships of others, pay for those necessities in cash, and then carry them away. Title to these goods would pass on American soil, and the duty of getting them out would fall on the belligerent buyers. Certainly this seems like a fair proposal, involving no vessels of our own, bringing us the "spot" cash, and, in general, adhering to all the conditions of good business.

What is the reality? In the first place—and this I term the most trenchant argument against it—we might be shifting the naval battles of that hypothetical war right to our own front yard. Let us assume that two countries with parity in naval power and consequent parity in command of the seas are at war. Is it not reasonable to suppose that both of these belligerents would have all types of naval vessels stationed in and around our ports, lying to in expectancy of the rich cargoes that are coming out? Would not our Atlantic and Pacific harbors be under the watchful surveillance of fighting-mad enemies?

As a matter of fact, let us look at the record in the Great War in the realm of international law. Here is a passage from a reputable writer which may give some light concerning the possibilities of protests over loitering cruisers:

Doubtless no legal duty is imposed upon a neutral to prevent the cruisers of a belligerent from patrolling the high seas adjacent and in close proximity to the territorial waters of the former, and that for the purpose of making the neighborhood a station of observation of the movements of enemy ships. While the United States as a neutral in 1916 advanced no claims that British vessels of war "cruising off American ports beyond the 3-mile limit" were exceeding "their strict legal rights under international law", the Department of State expressed the view that such practice was none the less an inevitable source of annoyance and offense, and made request that such vessels be instructed to withdraw from the vicinity of the territorial waters of the United States and to remain at such distances from American harbors and coasts as would avoid "the annoying and inquisitorial methods" which had compelled the Government to make complaint.

We know that the basis for the inviolability of neutral territorial waters is as old as neutrality itself, but unfortunately its actuality has been based upon the military and naval prestige of the neutral herself. Someday historians will show the tenacity which actuated the patriotic insistence of the little state of Holland for due observance by the Allies, especially of her rights in the family of nations. That heroic chapter is one of diplomatic letter writing refined to the *n*th degree, but with a refinement that shows how a foreign office of the smallest of nations, motivated by a militant regard for its rights, can stand on its hind legs and utilize the safeguards of international law. In those dark days, when mighty nations, even more mighty with naval supremacy, were sweeping honest and justifiable complaints aside on the grounds of their primordial right of self-preservation, that little "spitfire" stood out like an oasis of rugged militancy without drawing a sword. One recalls another former day when Holland saved the freedom of the press for the world and made herself the vantage ground from which, in the darkest hour of oppression, the victims of oppressors sought the ear of Europe. It is worth while to recall and digest both instances.

We have seen also that a weak neutral will have instances like those of China when the Japanese on August 11, 1904, entered the neutral port of Chefoo, seized and towed out a partially disarmed enemy torpedo boat. In the World War on March 14, 1915, the British cruisers Kent and Glasgow saw the German cruiser Dresden in the Chilean port of Cumberland Bay and opened fire on her. The Dresden's captain realized the vulnerability of his position and blew up his powder magazine to sink his ship. We know, too, that British and German submarines constantly threatened the territorial waters of adjacent neutral countries.

In addition to these reasons will we not end in losing our merchant marine? Certainly, if we allow belligerents to bring their own vessels and they do so, it will not take them long to realize that they, too, may develop their own merchant marine in peacetime. Certainly, too, there is the question of the intricacies of international trade with very few nations able to buy in our markets, however ready and willing. It has been suggested also that this method would not concern our trade at all with other neutrals, and these are the ones who would involve us in just as difficult problems as the belligerents themselves.

If there is one question to be learned from the study of neutrality, it is that there is no short cut to complete perfect neutrality. The path is long and arduous, beset with problems and obstacles whose ambit is the world itself. We may fix our eyes on the heights that beckon, but the road will be at times dreary and heartbreaking. So long as we keep our fervor unquenched, our efforts will not be in vain. In many ways the story of the future is written in the past. In the thought of Socrates, let us employ his exhortation to bring all things to the test of incessant inquiry and not to content ourselves with the verdict of authorities, majorities, or customs; judging of right and wrong, not by the will or sentiments of others, but by the light which God has set in each man's reason and conscience. Authority itself is often wrong, and it has no warrant to impose conviction. The great Greek philosopher emancipated us for thought, but not for action. Life supplies that urge, and this very problem, momentous, stupendous, and in its infancy, is just ahead of us.

WHAT THE PRESIDENT SAID IN HIS MESSAGE

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, being a nonpartisan Representative in Congress, I can freely express my views, both favorable and unfavorable, upon what the President said in his message. Politically, I have no ax to grind, for neither of the great parties represented in Congress, in my opinion, truly represent the mass of the people of this Nation.

The President, as usual, said many good things. He always does; but when it comes to putting into operation what he says, the job is turned over to someone else, and the actual thing is seldom done. His sentiments concerning the necessity of continued relief in the form of work are good—excellent; but when he leaves Harry L. Hopkins to carry out the program the whole plan fails in execution. His plan to extend financial relief through the Federal land banks, the Regional Agricultural Corporation, and other Government finance institutions is a worthy purpose; but when he leaves the management of all of these institutions in the hands of reactionaries, who refuse credit to the worthy, the President's good words are lost in bad deeds.

In his message the President said, among other important things:

Let action [against his policy] be positive and not negative. The way is open in the Congress of the United States for an expression of opinion by yeas and nays.

What a grand Government this would be if, in fact, the Members of the Congress could get a yea-and-nay vote on important legislation. As a matter of fact, the minority of Congress cannot get a yea-and-nay vote on anything—no such vote can be had when the leaders in Congress refuse to permit a vote. Can we, the minority, 208 Members of Congress who signed the petition, get a yea-and-nay vote on the Frazier-Lemke bill? No; we have tried for three sessions of Congress to get a vote, and it cannot be had. The President knows all about this situation. He told a committee from the Frazier-Lemke signers that he was not blocking a vote, and the next day he told another committee, including the Chairman of the Rules Committee and the Speaker of the House, that he did not want the bill to come up for a vote. What is good for one bill should be good for another. If the President means what he said in his message, we can now get a vote on the Frazier-Lemke bill, because he says the way is open for a yea-and-nay vote. We are going out again to secure the necessary nine signatures to bring up the Frazier-Lemke bill for a vote. Will we get those names? We will, unless it is noised around the Chamber that the President does not want the bill to come up. If the President means what he said in his message, no more Democrats will withdraw their names at the request of the House leaders. The House leaders are all right—they have never taken any position that the President did not want them to take on the Frazier-Lemke bill.

Again the President said in his message:

> We have returned control of the Federal Government to the city of Washington.

What a grand feeling it would be if that were true. I submit that we have not disturbed in the least the control of this Government by the financial interest of the country. Private banking interests still use the Government money and credit for nothing, while the people are compelled to agree to pay interest rates that are impossible to pay. We have not returned the control of the money and credit of this Nation to the people. We are still issuing bonds, paying interest on them, while the financial interests reap the harvest of interest income. We are now paying a billion and a quarter of interest on the public debt which we ought not to pay and would not have to pay if the Government would issue currency instead of bonds. I invite anyone to suggest why the Government's name attached to a bond is good while the Government's name attached to a piece of currency is not. Both are obligations of the Government; while one draws interest and bankrupts the people, the other would let all the citizens and not the few benefit from the use of the Government's money and credit. Every time the people buy a dollar's worth of goods, 33 cents on the dollar is a payment of interest. As long as this program is continued, can anyone—can the President of the United States say that the Government of the United States has been returned to the city of Washington?

Why does the President oppose the Frazier-Lemke bill which will reduce the farmers' interest to a fair amount without costing the people a cent? In view of his stand against this bill, how can he say that he is taking action against the bondholders and the interest grabbers who still control the Government? They must control it, or we could break their strangle hold on the very lives of the American people. When the Goldsborough amendment to the Federal Reserve Banking Act was before Congress it would have, if passed, broken the power of the banking interests to use the Government's money and credit for nothing. But the amendment, through opposition of the administration, was voted down. Have we, then, restored this Government to the people of the United States? No; far from it. To say that we have, sounds well, and I, for one, only wish it were true; but the facts do not warrant any such assertion.

When Huey Long, on the closing day of the last Congress, demanded that the House vote on the amendments of the Senate to the appropriation bill, was the way open for a yea-and-nay vote on the proposition, as the President suggested in his message? No; the way was closed. This House never had an opportunity to vote. That is all Huey Long was fighting for; he was fighting for representative government. He lost his fight, and the people of the United States lost also. In return for what he gave for representative government, he was condemned by the administration leaders, in and out of Congress. In return for the fight he made to preserve representative government, he gave his life. No one could give more. Yet in view of all this, the President of the United States says that the way is open in the Congress of the United States for an expression of opinion by yea-and-nay vote. No; this is not so. It may be all right to tell the people of the country that this is so, but every last Member of this Congress knows it is not so, and never has been, no matter what administration has been in power. The government will never be returned to Washington until these rules of the House, giving the majority the right to gag the minority, have been abrogated and outlawed.

The President further said, speaking of the acts of Congress:

> The Congress has the right and can find the means to protect its own prerogatives.

When this Government was established the debates in the Constitutional Convention show that it was the intent and purpose of that body to set up three coordinate branches of the Government, each acting entirely independently of the other. The Constitution gave the Supreme Court jurisdiction and power to review and consider acts of Congress. It did so in this express language:

> Article III, section 2: The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority.

The Constitution itself having given the Supreme Court jurisdiction over acts of Congress, it is self-evident that Congress cannot by an act confer any greater dignity to the act, under the Constitution, than the subject matter itself warrants. To say that Congress has the right and can find the means to protect its own prerogatives is meaningless, unless the President has in mind passing an act of Congress declaring that the Supreme Court shall never disturb an act of Congress, or unless we take the further chance of abolishing the Supreme Court altogether by an act of Congress. In either case, under the Constitution, the act would be void. There is a way to take this power away from the Supreme Court. That way is open to a yea-and-nay vote of expression. We can amend the Constitution, limiting the power of the Supreme Court, if the people want it done. The power to maintain this Government, to modify it, to destroy it altogether rests with the people.

Can the Supreme Court by its edict abolish Congress? Certainly not. Can the Supreme Court abolish the office of President of the United States? Certainly not. Can the President by Executive order dissolve the Congress? Certainly not. Can the President by Executive order suspend the functions of the Supreme Court? Certainly not. Can the Congress by its own act make its acts immune to review by the Supreme Court? Certainly not. Can Congress abolish the Supreme Court by its own act? Certainly not.

There is only one way in which we can accomplish desirable changes, and that way is to follow the rules laid down by which these changes can be made. Can we change the Constitution, under the terms of the Constitution? Certainly, we have repeatedly done that. Can we do it again? Certainly. Can we limit the power of the Supreme Court under the Constitution? Certainly; but we can only do it by an amendment to the Constitution itself, and to hold out the hope that Congress can limit the power of the Supreme Court is as visionary as it is to say that the Government of these United States has been returned to the city of Washington.

I offer these objections to the President's message not in any partisan spirit to either hinder the progress of the administration or for the purpose of ending it at the next election. I offer them because it is just to enter them. The President must be given credit for some outstanding achievements. His fight against the Power Trust made millions feel that they had a friend in court. The outstanding achievement of the Seventy-fourth Congress, in my opinion, was the act of Congress bringing the Power Trust under direct supervision of Congress and preventing them from gouging the innocent public out of billions in their schemes of high finance. The President's insistance that the hungry be fed, at all costs, was a powerful voice speaking for those in distress; his courage in defining "special privilege" and in calling attention of the people to the aims and purposes of big business was like a fresh breeze on a sultry day.

I have supported him in these achievements, irrespective of party, when many of his Democratic friends in this House deserted him. I have no intention now of refusing to give him whatever support I possess on questions of great public and humanitarian character.

I do not understand why in some matters he has been a great President and in other matters he has failed as definitely as his predecessor. I do not understand why he will not take the control of Government money and credit away from the private banking interests of the country; I do not understand why he desires to continue the practice of issuing bonds; I do not understand why he refuses to pay the soldiers' bonus in cash by the issuance of currency which will not cost the taxpayers of the country one cent more than it will cost if the bonus were defeated; I do not understand why we must struggle along with a circulation of $17,000,000,000 when for normal need we require thirty billions; I do not understand why he opposes the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill, which will save 2,000,000 farm homes that now cannot be financed through any Government agency; I do not understand why he takes no positive action to remove the interest burden from the backs of the American people; I do not understand why, by implication, he suggests that Congress can by law take away the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court vested by the Constitution, when it is obvious to all that the way is open to do that by constitutional amendment; I do not understand why he was willing to partially restore the value of farm products through the A. A. A. but was not willing to espouse the cause of cost of production, without which all farmers will become bankrupt; I do not understand why he stated in his message that the way was open in the Congress for the expression of opinion by yea-and-nay vote when that has never been permitted in this Congress for the last 50 years.

I may not have been in the Congress long enough to understand the many intricacies of politics, but I do not think I have been here long enough to have lost the power of observation and reasoning. I would therefore ask some Member of this House who knows to unravel this obviously inconsistent attitude of the President of the United States.

ACTS OF CONGRESS HELD UNCONSTITUTIONAL

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, several days ago I obtained unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD. I have since then obtained an estimate and I therefore renew the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, much has been said about the constitutionality of the acts of Congress since the days of George Washington's first inauguration. After checking up, it is gratifying to know that out of the 24,000 acts of Congress, more or less, since that time, only 63 or 64 have been declared unconstitutional. At this time it is of much interest to all those in any way interested in the Federal Government's activities to know just what acts were declared unconstitutional and their nature. I therefore take pleasure in giving a list of these acts: It will be noted that some forty of them were put on the statute books when the Republican Party was in the majority in both the House and the Senate and under a Republican President, while some twenty when the Democrats were in the majority in the House and Senate and under a Democratic President.

1. Act of September 24, 1789 (1 Stat. 81, sec. 13, in part).
Provision that "* * * (the Supreme Court) shall have power to issue * * * writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any * * * persons holding office, under authority of the United States" held not to authorize issue of mandamus to the Secretary of State requiring him to deliver to plaintiff a commission (duly signed by the President) as justice of the peace in the District of Columbia.

NOTE.—The specific notes involved in the case were issued under the act of 1862, and the opinion (p. 613) states the question for determination to be "whether the act of February 25, 1862 * * * is constitutional"; but the other clauses cited, being practically identical, would surely be covered by the decision.

NOTE.—Aside from the few instances where an entire act, or a complete title, etc., have been expressly held unconstitutional, the question of the exact scope of the decisions is frequently one of considerable difficulty. It is not always a matter simply of striking out; often it is to introduce qualifications or limitations. The indications given in the above list are, therefore, suggestive only. Any such list must be used with the utmost care, bearing in mind the established rule, that a decision against the validity of an act of Congress goes no further than is absolutely required by the case at bar.

Since the above data were compiled the Frazier-Lemke Act of June 28, 1934, was declared unconstitutional on May 27, 1935.

And the Agricultural Adjustment Act of May 12, 1933, was declared unconstitutional on January 6, 1936.

PAYMENT OF THE ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter I received from the Army and Navy Union which pertains to the legislation under consideration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter received by me from the Army and Navy Union:

NATIONAL CORPS ARMY AND NAVY UNION, U. S. A.,
OFFICE OF NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE CHAIRMAN,
Washington, D. C., January 8, 1936.

Hon. B. W. GEARHART, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GEARHART: The Army and Navy Union of the United States of America, organized in 1886, composed of present and former members of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, desires at this time to extend greetings to you.

In this message we wish to convey our position on the subject of the immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates.

While many members of this organization are not eligible for, and will not receive any direct sum of money by the passage of this proposed legislation, nevertheless it is the unanimous opinion of the entire membership that such an expenditure, by the National Congress at this time, will be a tremendous medium in stimulating business throughout the Nation and will relieve great hardships now endured by veterans of the World War.

May we point out further that an additional important factor is the number of working hours that will be created by the increased demand for and sale of necessary commodities, the production of same undoubtedly being increased to meet greater sales?

There is before you, for your consideration, the Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill jointly backed by the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, and the Disabled American Veterans of the World War. This measure has been designed to carry out solely the desires of World War veterans.

Therefore this measure has the fullest endorsement of the Army and Navy Union of the United States of America.

We urgently request that you support this measure endorsed by the holders of the adjusted-service certificates as it expresses their wishes on this most controversial subject.

As you are an ex-service man and because of the continued interest you have displayed throughout the years in behalf of all ex-service men, we are asking you to kindly request permission to have this letter placed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the earliest possible moment.

Respectfully yours,

ROBERT SHRAGE,
National Commander.
By JOHN J. CRIM,
National Legislative Chairman.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include in the extension of my remarks certain excerpts from reports, letters, and documents.

There was no objection.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JANUARY 10, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Look down upon us, Almighty God, with that compassion which belongs to Thee. Forgive us our sins and bestow Thy blessing upon us. Bless Thy truth today, and may its spirit reach the heights of feeling and the depths of affection. Be Thou, dear Lord, in all the retiring places of sorrow, where the human heart weeps alone and where faith looks up and discerns invisible things and where memory is exultant. We pray for the poor, for the overworked, and for those who have no work. We thank Thee for the Heart of Nazareth—how beautiful His sympathy, how gentle His judgments, how wonderful His revulsion from hypocrisy, cruelty, and oppression. O let the knowledge of the Christ extend throughout all our land. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, I should like to have the majority leader tell us what he expects will be the program on Monday and Tuesday of next week.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Monday, as the gentleman knows, is District day, and we understand the District Committee expects to use the entire day on their bills.

Mr. SNELL. It is the program to let that committee have the entire day?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; and on Tuesday we expect to resume consideration of the appropriation bill that we have had up.

Mr. SNELL. And there will be general debate at that time?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to read into the RECORD a telegram received from the officers of the Illinois Veterans' League and to supplement such telegram with a few remarks, all of which will not take over 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes and to read the telegram to which he has referred.

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me the time for debate on this proposition has gone by. I understood the debate had been exhausted. If it is the desire to start debate again this morning, all right; I have no objection; but I want it understood that if somebody else wants to make a statement, he shall be allowed to do so, and I would like to know whether the program is to open up debate now or not.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I object to any further debate on the subject of the bonus.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, then I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and insert the telegram referred to.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following telegram received by me today from the officers of the Illinois Veterans' League:

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., January 10, 1936.

Hon. SCOTT W. LUCAS,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

More than 75,000 Illinois veterans have already signed our petition asking for payment of adjusted-service certificates in cash with more signers coming in daily. Petitioners are from all parts of the State, many of them your friends from your district. We respectfully urge that you vote and work for the immediate passage of the bill.

ILLINOIS VETERANS' LEAGUE,
JOHN F. NOVAK, Jr., President.
L. A. MOORE, Secretary.

Mr. Speaker, 75,000 veterans from every section of Illinois cannot be wrong. I sincerely hope that my colleagues in Illinois, regardless of political affiliations, will respect the wishes of the veterans upon this exceedingly important legislation.

The petitions are being sent to Washington, and I propose to present them to the Finance Committee of the Senate at the proper time with the urgent request they be given the consideration they so justly deserve.

ADDRESS BEFORE THE AMERICAN BANKERS' ASSOCIATION CONVENTION

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address by Governor Eccles, of the Federal Reserve Board, before the American Bankers Association. The Public Printer notifies me that it will require about three and a half pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to insert this address.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to have the gentleman tell the Members of the House what it is going to cost to print this speech.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The Public Printer states it will cost $158.

Mr. RICH. I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that all this matter going into the RECORD is quite costly to the taxpayers of their districts, and they will be held responsible for a great deal of this expense when election comes next fall.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Hon. Marriner S. Eccles, Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, before the American Bankers' Association convention in New Orleans, November 14, 1935:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, after the remarks of the chairman, I assure you that it is rather embarrassing for me to appear before you. I feel he has given you reason to expect altogether too much.

I did not prepare a written address for this occasion, feeling that I should like to come before you in more or less of an informal way, as a banker talking to bankers, as a businessman talking to businessmen. I should like to talk to you as I would talk to my closest friends and associates.

Most of my life has been spent in the field of banking and business, and until I unexpectedly went to Washington, less than 2 years ago, I had never occupied a public position. I, therefore, can talk to you and approach the questions which I am sure we are all deeply interested in, only as a practical businessman and banker.

I am reminded in meeting with you today of the contrast between the conditions under which we are now meeting and the conditions under which this same meeting was held 3 years ago.

Three years ago, after pursuing what were considered sound financial policies, after attempting through every effort to balance the Budget, after maintaining the gold standard, after avoiding any increase in taxes, we found ourselves confronted with disaster. We found that the national income had diminished in less than 3 years from $81,000,000,000 to less than $40,000,000,000, and we found that tax collections also fell.

We found that we were confronted with an army of unemployed of more than 12,000,000 people. We found the banking system in a state of collapse. We found deposits had declined by more than one-third as a result of credit contraction, bank failures, and hoarding. We found that though every effort was made to balance the Budget some Government bonds had sold as low as 83, and other high-grade securities held by banks were selling at such a price that had they been sold on the existing market there would have been few banks in the United States in which the capital was not either completely wiped out or seriously impaired; that under the auspices, gentlemen, of what is considered orthodox economics, under the conditions that were expected to produce confidence and induce private industry to undertake to put people to work and to result in increased borrowing from the banks and thus in restoration of the necessary volume of deposits, we found that the economic life of the country was in a complete collapse.

Today, in a recent compilation I had made with reference to the value of stocks, I find that as compared with the low prices of 1932 there is an appreciation of more than $20,000,000,000 in the quoted value of stocks listed on the exchange. That has not been brought about by an increase in credit extended by banks because neither brokers' loans nor bank loans on collateral have increased. It has been caused by the fact that those who had money were investing in securities because they were aware of the increase in the earnings and the prospective earnings of the corporations whose securities are listed.

Contrast that picture with the condition of the corporations in 1932, when the income-tax reports made by all corporations to the Treasury of the United States showed a net loss before dividends and before income taxes of more than $3,750,000,000. The quoted value of bonds listed on the exchange, of which there were some in your portfolios that meant bankruptcy and insolvency to you, has increased by more than $7,000,000,000 since early 1933. The bankruptcies, which had reached the astounding proportions at that time of more than 25,000 for the first 9 months of 1932, with total liabilities aggregating more than $750,000,000, today are less than 9,000 for the first 9 months of this year, with liabilities around $170,000,000.

Bank failures for the first 9 months in 1932 exceeded 1,000, and the deposit liabilities for banks failing were nearly $600,000,000. For the first 9 months of this year bank failures numbered 80, with deposit liabilities of approximately $36,000,000. These figures include the banks which were not licensed after the bank holiday and which were forced to liquidate later because it was not possible to reorganize and open them. They comprise most of the amount.

Bank deposits, which, due to credit contraction made on the part of the bankers, had decreased greatly (and I do not blame any banker; I was as busy in the field of private banking as anyone could be in an effort to remain liquid, to be able to meet the demands of the depositors due to lack of confidence in the banking structure) have increased from a low point of $12,000,000,000 to $17,500,000,000, or above the level of 1929. When I say bank deposits I mean the adjusted demand deposits of member banks, which exclude interbank deposits and Government deposits.

The national income, which had fallen to a little less than $40,000,000,000 for the year 1932, rose to nearly $50,000,000,000 for 1934. The figures are not available for the current year, but I believe that at the present rate of business activity the national income in the next 12 months will come close to $60,000,000,000, or about halfway back to the national income of 1929.

The Government receipts, which had fallen from better than $4,000,000,000 in 1929 to around $2,000,000,000 in 1932, as estimated in the last-announced estimates of Federal revenue, will reach for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1936, a figure of $4,470,000,000, or an increase of approximately $2,400,000,000.

The foreign-trade figures are approximately 40 percent in excess of the foreign-trade figures in 1932.

Industrial production reflected in the Federal Reserve's seasonally adjusted index is now at 89 percent of the 1923–25 average, raising it from a low point of 58 in 1932, a gain of more than 50 percent.

The wholesale-price index of commodities, using 1926 as a basis of 100, had fallen to a low of 60 in February of 1933. It had risen to 81 in September of this year.

In the field of farm products wholesale prices had dropped as low as 41 percent in February 1933. They were up to 80 percent last September.

The farm income, which dropped from $10,500,000,000 in 1929 to something over $4,000,000,000 in 1932, is estimated for this year to be back to nearly $7,000,000,000, a gain in that field of $2,500,000,000.

I could go on and cite many other factors, such as increased building activity, revival in the capital market, increase in employment and pay rolls, but enough has been given to mark the impressive improvement between the condition of 3 years ago and the present time in every field—financial, commercial, industrial, agricultural, and fiscal.

What is the reason for this change? It is not a result of accident; it is not a result of letting nature take its course. For 3 years nature was permitted to take its course in an effort to revive confidence. Little legislation that was disturbing to business was passed. No Banking Act of 1935 was pending to make bankers hesitate to make loans.

But a condition was reached, even as early as the spring of 1932, when Government intervention became unavoidable not because the Government wanted to intervene but because the entire financial and credit structure was in a state of disastrous contraction. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was organized to support the crumbling structure.

The Government had financed the Grain and Cotton Stabilization Corporations in order to help agriculture.

The Home Loan Bank System was organized in order to help the urban-mortgage situation. But the scale of intervention was entirely inadequate, and the forces of deflation had been so much underestimated that a complete collapse resulted in the following spring.

No one objected to an unbalanced Budget in order to bolster up the banking, the insurance, the railroad, and the credit structure generally.

Is it consistent or possible to think that Government could intervene in the field of private credit through the banking, insurance, and other private structures and at the same time refuse to intervene in order to stop the foreclosure of farm mortgages, which reached an appalling figure, to stop the foreclosure of home mortgages, which reached a figure as high as 35,000 in 1 month?

Is it possible to justify the use of Federal credit, resulting in an unbalanced Budget in the fields referred to, and at the same time permit 12,000,000 men who wanted work to go unemployed?

Business claims the liberty of employing and discharging men when their services cannot be used profitably, and that is its right. But what about the liberty of the men under the conditions that we were confronted with in 1932 and 1933? If a government is justified in incurring an indebtedness of $25,000,000,000 to protect its citizens against the encroachment of a foreign enemy in times of war, is not a government justified in using its credit for the purpose of taking care of those people who found themselves in a position of destitution because of the failure of private industry to give them employment? [Applause.]

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation put a foundation under the banking structure. The Emergency Banking Act, passed at the time of the bank holiday, permitted the Reserve System to loan not only to national and member banks but to State nonmember banks against any sound asset. When that was announced by the President of the United States over the radio, the people of the country who had withdrawn their deposits in the form of currency and who had attempted to transfer it out of the country stopped that practice, which was totally destructive to the entire credit and banking fabric.

When the people were told that the Reserve System could issue Federal Reserve bank notes against mortgages, against collateral loans, and against other good assets held by the banks, without regard to gold backing, without regard to eligible paper backing, without regard to Government bond backing, they brought back into the banks during the next year $2,000,000,000 of currency which they had taken out.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has rehabilitated the capital structure of banks to the extent of approximately $1,000,000,000, and it has loaned over $800,000,000 to the receivers of closed banks so as to prevent the forced liquidation of assets and to give to depositors immediately available funds, so as to relieve them and to enable them to put that money into circulation.

The Home Owners' Loan Corporation was established for the purpose of relieving home owners in distress and up to the present time has loaned approximately $3,000,000,000. The work of that institution is nearly completed. The distressed mortgage is a thing of the past. Real-estate values have been stabilized and are advancing. Rents have been on an increase for 2 years and doubling up is lessening. New-home construction is increasing, and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation will be through with the work it has done, with more than a billion dollars of unused authorization to its credit.

It not only served as a debtor relief but also served equally as a creditor relief. The mortgages held by the savings banks, the insurance companies, and the commercial banks, which they were unable and unwilling to carry, were taken over and funded over a longer period at reduced rates by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

The Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation was organized, and $2,000,000,000 of bonds were provided fully guaranteed by the Government, these funds to be loaned to Federal land banks in exchange for the bonds of these banks, backed in turn by mortgages, and to be issued as proceeds of mortgage loans by the Land Bank Commissioner.

The Federal land banks are institutions going back about 20 years. In 1932 they were unable to sell their bonds on the market. These same bonds are now selling at a premium, and a substantial amount of them have been refunded into issues bearing lower interest rates. When it was impossible to sell them, the Government agency set up for the purpose took those bonds and issued bonds guaranteed by the Government.

That has stopped the collapse of the farm-mortgage market, until today I hear that there are more farms being sold than are being foreclosed upon. [Applause.]

These three great creditor agencies have largely done their work. No one is more anxious than the Federal Government to have the private credit agencies take over the load.

The Federal Housing Administration Act was passed for the purpose of attempting to induce the private credit agencies of this country to make loans for construction purposes on insured mortgages and for modernization. Not one dollar of Government funds goes into those loans. The Federal Government was attempting to create a mechanism by which to attract private funds into the field of credit and get the Government out.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is collecting far more than it is lending. It has loaned about $5,000,000,000 and has collected more than one-half of the total amount of the loans.

In the field of relief, which we so often refer to as "waste", we have the thousands of miles of public roads, we have the excellent work done in our C. C. C. camps, we have repaired and rebuilt schools, water systems, and sewer systems. Truly not all self-liquidating projects. It is possible for the Government to spend money for social purposes, and it should not always judge or gage its expenditure by whether or not it is a self-liquidating project. [Applause.]

The problem of private profit and self-liquidation belongs to the field of private business and not to the Federal Government. [Applause.]

Now, let us see if the results as enumerated are worth the cost of intervention which resulted in an unbalanced Budget. I would like to remind you that we had an unbalanced Budget as early as the fiscal year ending in 1931 and that the deficit for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, exceeded $3,000,000,000; that the Government's interest-bearing debt increased from $20,584,000,000 in February 1933 to $28,432,000,000 in September of 1935, an increase of $7,848,000,000.

Deduct the assets, including cash on hand, the gold profit in the stabilization fund, the Government's proprietary interest in organizations such as the R. F. C., and you have a net increase in the Government debt of about $3,000,000,000. But let us take the larger figure for the purpose of comparison. Let us take the amount of the gross deficit.

Should we be alarmed over that situation? Should some of the increases which I have referred to—such as the $20,000,000,000 increase if the quoted value of listed stocks without taking into account an increase of from $15,000,000,000 to $20,000,000,000 in the national income in 1 year—give us any cause for concern about even the amount of the gross deficit? Does it mean that we are putting a great burden upon posterity?

If you will recall, during the 10 years from 1920 to 1930, while the Government debt which had been $26,000,000,000 incurred almost entirely in a period of 2 short years, was decreased by about $10,000,000,000, this country at the same time added $100,000,000,000 or more to its new wealth in the form of increased productive facilities and we purchased $10,000,000,000 of foreign security issues and reduced the Federal income taxes during that period four different times. If we could do it then, why think that we cannot do it again?

I should like to commend to your attention Lord Macaulay's History of England, in which he recounts how the British debt from the period of the contest with Louis XIV rose from £50,000,000 to more than £800,000,000 and how "at every stage in the growth of that debt it has been seriously asserted by wise men that bankruptcy and ruin were at hand. Yet still the debt went on growing; and still bankruptcy and ruin were as remote as ever."

I cannot read all of the statement, but I am going to quote a few high lights from it.

After telling of the repeated outcries against the debt, he told how it kept mounting, yet how England prospered despite the prophets of disaster, and he continues:

"The beggared, the bankrupt society not only proved able to meet all its obligations, but while meeting those obligations grew richer and richer so fast that the growth could almost be discerned by the eye * * *.

"While shallow politicians were repeating that the energies of the people were borne down by the weight of the public burdens, the first journey was performed by steam on a railway. Soon the island was intersected by railways. A sum exceeding the whole amount of the national debt at the end of the American wars was, in a few years, voluntarily expended by this ruined people in viaducts, tunnels, embankments, bridges, stations, engines. Meanwhile taxation was almost constantly becoming lighter and lighter; yet still the exchequer was full. It may now be affirmed without fear of contradiction that we find it as easy to pay the interest of eight hundred millions as our ancestors found it, a century ago, to pay the interest of eighty millions.

"It can hardly be doubted that there must have been some great fallacy in the notions of those who uttered and of those who believed that long succession of confident predictions, so signally falsified by a long succession of indisputable facts. To point out the fallacy is the office rather of the political economist than of the historian. Here it is sufficient to say that the prophets of evil were under a double delusion. They erroneously imagined that there was an exact analogy between the case of an individual who is in debt to another individual and the case of a society which is in debt to a part of itself (which pays interest to itself); and this analogy led them into endless mistakes about the effect of the system of (Government borrowing and) funding.

"They were under an error not less serious touching on the resources of the country. They made no allowance for the effect produced by the incessant progress of every experimental science, and by the incessant efforts of every man to get on in life. They saw that the debt grew, and they forgot that other things grew as well as the debt (that taxes are high or low in relation to national income)."

At the bottom of the depression we would have been worse off with no taxes at all than we are today with the taxes that we have. [Applause.]

"A long experience justifies us in believing that England may, in the twentieth century, be better able to bear a debt of sixteen hundred millions than she is at the present time to bear her present load. Be this as it may, those who so confidently predicted that she must sink, first under a debt of fifty millions, then under a debt of eighty millions, then under a debt of one hundred and forty millions, then under a debt of two hundred and forty millions, and lastly under a debt of eight hundred millions were beyond all doubt under a twofold mistake. They greatly overrated the pressure of the burden; they greatly underrated the strength by which the burden was to be borne."

That was a century ago when the debt reached £800,000,000. Today that debt is nearly 10 times that figure, and the standards of the people of England, not only the workingman but the businessman, are higher than they were then. They are far better off as a society after carrying the debt than they were at that time.

Have we not yet learned that what we cannot afford is not the burden of carrying the national debt but is an army of idle men and unutilized facilities? For the cost of what we lost in the last few years as a result of permitting deflation to run far on its course before checking the devastation—the loss in national wealth and the national income from idleness of millions of men and innumerable productive facilities would run into more than $150,000,000,000. The entire amount of our present national debt is less than 4 months of the normal national income.

It seems to me that it may be interesting to compare the picture of England with that of the United States so far as debt is concerned.

The debt of the United Kingdom (and that does not mean only the central government; it means all public bodies) was 194 percent of the national income in 1934. In the United States the debt of all public bodies was 74 percent of the national income. The total interest paid by all public bodies on their debt in England amounts to 8 percent of the national income; in the United States a little over 3 percent of the national income.

I do not want to give you men the impression that a budgetary deficit is desirable. I only want to point out to you that it is not the serious thing it has been magnified to be. [Applause.] The serious thing is the loss of $40,000,000,000 in our annual national income, which the capitalistic system, when left to itself without adequate Government intervention, brought about by the year 1932.

We shall not continue to have a budgetary deficit when the conditions that caused the deficit, the reduction in national income, are corrected. As national income increases, Federal income increases; and as Federal income increases, the need for Government spending decreases, because of an increase in activity, employment, prices, etc.

And that is the trend today. From more than $4,000,000,000 in 1929 the Federal income dropped down at the bottom of the depression to $2,000,000,000, and is now back at more than $4,000,000,000.

The deficit, which reached a peak in the fiscal year ending June 1934, was approximately $4,000,000,000, and it is estimated that in 1936 it will be $3,280,000,000.

I should like to sum up what I think all this means to bankers. I feel that you have every reason in the world to have confidence that the system of private industry and the system of private banking has a future, if you will but profit by the lessons of the past; if you will but do your part and step out into the field and extend, not the type of credit that you may prefer to extend, 90 days' or 6 months' credit, but the kind of credit that there is a demand for in your communities. You don't hesitate to buy in the market finance company paper and intermediate credit bank paper at as low as 1 percent. Why don't you short-circuit the funds and lend directly to those in the community that are going outside and paying from 5 to 12 percent for credit from the very institutions which you are financing at 1 percent? [Applause.]

Why don't you, when you are the custodians of $10,000,000,000 of the savings funds of the people, invest those funds in the field where such funds should be invested? They are the same type of funds as the funds that the insurance companies, the mutual savings banks, and the savings-and-loan associations are investing; and if you are going to hold those funds and pay interest on them, you must put those funds in the long-term mortgage market, in the long-term bond market, and you can do it with every security.

You are loaning on a basis of values that is not inflated; and if you want the Government and the Government agencies to get out, then it is up to you to get in. [Applause.]

If you prefer to buy Government bonds and bonds guaranteed by the Government to act as your cushion, then you cannot complain about the Federal Government being a competitor with you in the field. [Applause.]

If the Government had chosen or desired to destroy private banking, it needed to do nothing at all. In 1932 private banking had completely destroyed itself. [Applause.] But the Federal Government believed in private banking, and in private initiative, and in private business, and for that reason it saved the banking system for the bankers to do a better job in the future than many had done in the past. [Applause.]

It seems to me, in summing up the review I have made, that an analysis of the nature, the cost and the timing of Government intervention, and of the recovery factors brings out conclusions which are inescapable. First, in order to keep our productive processes going and expanding, we must maintain a reasonable balance between our productive facilities and consumer buying power. Failing this, money becomes idle, because it cannot find profitable outlet for investment; unemployment develops, because buying power is insufficient to absorb the output of industry.

This results in the commencement of a period of deflation. It causes a contraction of debt, a reduction in spending, and, if the cycle is allowed to continue, this inevitably results, because the cycle is self-accelerating, in general prostration and bankruptcy.

It is as necessary to intervene to correct a situation of this sort as it is to prevent a cycle of inflation.

There will be 1,000 bankers saying that inflation should be avoided, and that public authorities, public officials in the Reserve System and in Government should stop inflation, whereas there is possibly a handful who feel, or at least have felt, that deflation should not be allowed to go its normal and natural course; that the natural law should be interfered with.

I cannot reconcile these two positions. I see no greater evils in inflation than in deflation. In fact, I think of the two, deflation is far more destructive to bankers.

It is necessary to intervene to correct a situation of this sort, just as necessary as it is to prevent a cycle of inflation. Only Government, which is all of us, is capable of acting collectively to offset and neutralize the effect of the downswing, and by its spending and the use of its credit effect the necessary distribution that private capital, left to the individual, has failed to effect. Action taken promptly by Government to stop the process of deflation in its inception will tend to keep up the national income and correct maldistribution and inequitable distribution, and at an infinitesimal cost compared with the cost to society as a whole if deflation is allowed to run its natural and destructive course. For Government to decrease its spending at the outset of a deflationary period, when everyone else is doing likewise, only accelerates the forces of deflation and does not create confidence. In such a situation capital does not flow into productive facilities because they are already excessive in relation to consumer buying power.

How can we say that individuals, corporations, and banks with funds to invest will be inclined to use those funds to put people to work when funds already invested are becoming less profitable daily as buying power decreases and unemployment spreads?

Confidence in the business world is the outgrowth of an opportunity to invest funds profitably. Funds are invested profitably only when there is sufficient buying power to purchase the output of increasing productive facilities.

I have attempted to portray the effects and the evils of deflation. We hear much about the evils of inflation. How is it possible to have inflation when men are idle and plants are idle? There can be speculative excesses when surplus funds bid up stocks or real estate, but general inflation can only come about by increasing the means of payment in the hands of the people who are willing to spend faster than we can increase production. We are a long way from such a period of inflation. [Applause.]

The idle balances of corporations and of individuals, even in 1929, with business going at a maximum, were very largely responsible for the stock-market inflation.

It must be evident from what I have said that we are in no immediate danger of inflation as a result of a budgetary deficit or as long as we have the facilities to produce and the men willing to work. [Applause.]

We have seen from the experience of the past 3 years that it is possible through adequate Government intervention to turn the tide of deflation to what has been termed "reflation." Is it not reasonable to conclude that had intervention come sooner and on a more adequate scale it would have taken far less spending and lending by the Federal Government to arrest and reverse the process of deflation?

The bankers, above all, have been the beneficiaries of the Government's intervention. The Government alone could and did replenish the supply of deposits when individual borrowers were lacking and when banks had no other profitable outlet for their funds than the investment in Government securities. Banks bought Government securities, not because of compulsion but because they had no other avenue of profitable investment.

The Federal Reserve System has purchased no Government bonds, has given no support to the Government bond market for 2 years, and the present amount of outstanding credit by the Federal Reserve System is less than it was in the spring of 1933. The excess reserves of the banks, which make money cheap, which induce them to purchase securities and make loans at present low interest levels, are a result very largely of gold imports.

Banks bought Government bonds not because of compulsion, but because they had no other avenue for profitable investment. Government bonds, far from being a burden, have been a godsend.

Those who talk about boycotting Government bonds suggest to me a drowning man to whom a life line is thrown out but who objects that it is an interference with his individual right and liberty to drown. [Laughter and applause.]

Speaking as a banker, businessman, and capitalist, I urge you as bankers to contrast the conditions and the prospects under which you meet today with the conditions and the outlook of 3 years ago and to ask yourselves how the transition has been brought about.

I am not prepared to admit that we must always have with us a vast army of unemployed. I am not ready to confess failure in making our individualistic capitalistic society function so as to utilize to the fullest the Nation's resources, of which, by far, the most important is human labor.

I do not believe that we are so wanting in intelligence and courage, or that we are so blind to the lessons of experience as to conclude that we are incapable of managing our affairs more prudently and more efficiently in the future than we have in the past.

I do not see how any thoughtful man can challenge the conclusion that in order to preserve our capitalistic system, our institutions, and traditions we must use such governmental means of economic and monetary management as we now possess in achieving a greater stability in the economic order and in creating conditions under which our man power and productive capacity may be utilized to a maximum in the production and the distribution of wealth.

The Federal Reserve System, with its authority over margin requirements and—under the Banking Act of 1935—its clarified responsibility for reserve requirements, discount rates, and open-market operations, is in a better position than ever before to exert its influence toward the attainment of a greater degree of stability and the avoidance of inflationary and deflationary extremes.

These powers, if exercised harmoniously, in conjunction with those possessed by the Federal Government through the Treasury—and to attempt to exercise the divided powers separately or conflictingly would be fatal—can, I am confident, contribute much to the achievement of a stable, orderly economic progress, free from violent extremes, and conducive to a maximum productivity and distribution. This involves neither a regimented nor a restricted economic order. It calls for Government intervention only to the extent that the exercise of governmental authority affecting monetary and budgetary factors may be a stabilizing and corrective influence in an individualistic, capitalistic system when it, left entirely to itself, generates distortions, lack of balance, and cyclic extremes.

The Government must be the compensatory agency in this economy; it must unbalance its Budget during deflation and create surpluses in periods of great business activity.

In the light of experience and in the interest of the public in general and of private banking in particular, it seems to me to be conclusively demonstrated that business and banking leadership should lend its full sympathy and support to the kind and extent of Government intervention that I have outlined. Only then, it seems to me, can private banking be assured of safe and profitable operation in the future and be freed from the uncertainties due to recurrent evils of booms and depressions. [Applause.]

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. KEE, of West Virginia, is ill in the Naval Hospital and unable to be here. If here, he would have voted "aye."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, on the vote just cast I have a telegram from the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. MONTET, saying that on account of illness it is impossible for him to be present; that had he been present he would have voted against the motion to recommit and in favor of the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Illinois, Mr. ADAIR, is unavoidably absent. If he had been present, he would have voted "no" on the motion to recommit and "aye" on the passage.

On motion of Mr. DOUGHTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, we have before the House the question of full payment of the adjusted-service certificates, or the so-called "bonus" measure. This should, in my judgment, be dependent upon whether it means new or additional tax burdens upon the people of the country. The demand for payment now because of the tremendous expenditures during the past 2½ years under the name of relief is recognized and understood. It can be accomplished without additional appropriation or increase in our anticipated national debt. In other words, if we have the courage to provide definitely for the method of financing this measure now instead of leaving this to the future, we can satisfactorily provide funds without disturbing the present financial condition of the Federal Government.

The latest Treasury report indicates an unexpended balance of over six and one-half billion dollars of funds already appropriated for emergency purposes, including those for agricultural aid, relief, public works, aid to home owners, and miscellaneous so-called recovery activities. Emergency expenditures for all purposes during the past 3 years have not in any one year exceeded $4,000,000,000. The demands for emergency expenditures, we are told, are constantly decreasing.

Almost two billions of emergency expenditures have been made during the first half of the current fiscal year; consequently a payment out of these unexpended emergency funds of approximately $2,000,000,000 for bonus requirements will not, in my judgment, seriously affect the emergency activities of the Government. Allowing another two billions for the remainder of the present fiscal year for emergency purposes and taking the two billions for bonus requirements from the six and one-half billions would still leave two and one-half billions for emergency purposes for the next fiscal year, 1937.

Bear in mind that, according to the best information available, the President contemplates asking for additional billions for emergency purposes during the year 1937. If this is the case, the bonus could be paid from unexpended balances and there would still be available for 1937 several billions of dollars for recovery and relief, or a sum greater than has been spent in any one year up to date.

Payment in this manner I favor, but all attempts to provide definite means of financing the payments were defeated. We are now faced with the proposal of adopting a measure which can only be designated as an authorization for appropriation, even permitting inflation. Congress should at this time provide the method of payment, because if this is not taken from balances available for emergency purposes it must be reflected in the Budget as an added expenditure, which means an increase in the national debt of $2,000,000,000 beyond the estimates submitted.

To this I cannot subscribe, believing it unnecessary to appropriate additional funds for the purpose of paying the bonus. Our aim should be to hold our expenditures within the revenue as nearly as possible and to bring about a balancing of our National Budget just as soon as possible. This is the only policy which will sustain our national credit and prevent adding to tax burdens.

I cannot conscientiously support a proposal which I feel might work a hardship not only on the veterans but on the entire population of the country, and which is unnecessary, inasmuch as funds already available could be utilized without jeopardizing the emergency and relief program.

IMMEDIATE PAYMENT ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES TO WORLD WAR VETERANS

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, there is every indication that the long and hard fight for immediate payment of adjusted-service certificates to World War veterans is almost won. Today we stand on the threshold of victory. The opposition has almost entirely disappeared. The necessary legislation will be passed by an overwhelming majority.

It is gratifying to me, as one of those who, from the beginning, has recognized the justice of the demand for immediate payment of the adjusted certificates to our ex-service men, to realize that it will become an accomplished fact at this session of Congress.

There are several contributing factors to this very desirable result:

First. There is unity and accord between the several veterans' organizations as to the character of the legislation that should be enacted to accomplish the purpose. The present legislation—H. R. 9500—known as the Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill, represents the combined thought of the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, Disabled American War Veterans, and the friends of the veterans in Congress who have given the matter their attention during the past several years since it became apparent that right and justice demanded immediate payment of the certificates.

Second. The controversies, debates, speeches, and propaganda, both for and against, in the Halls of Congress, newspapers, magazines, and over the radio, and, particularly in political campaigns wherein candidates for Congress have declared themselves and given their reasons either for or against the proposition, have brought an abundance of information on the subject to the citizenship of our country. The fact that the people of the country have responded favorably to the enactment of this legislation after hearing and learning the real underlying reasons is an indication that the cause is just.

It is needless for me to restate in detail at this time the reasons that have actuated my constant support of legislation of this type, the purpose of which has been to make possible the immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates. On every occasion that such legislation has been before the House for consideration my vote has been cast in favor of its adoption. Today is the fourth time. The reasons that have prompted my favorable consideration in the past have time and again been fully set forth. Today the issue is so plain, the result of the vote to be taken so sure of being favorable, that it is unnecessary for me, or anyone else whose record has been so constantly favorable to the legislation, to set forth again the reasons that have justified my course in the past and which will continue to justify my continued support of this and all other legislation to give complete justice to our World War veterans in this important matter.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, in supporting the bill (H. R. 9870) providing for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates and for the cancelation of any unpaid interest that may have accrued on loans secured by such certificates, I feel that I am properly representing my constituency in western Illinois. Those who served in the World War have patiently waited for the money rightfully due them, and I believe that if the Congress does make full payment at this time, much will be gained economically in that the benefits of such payments will reach into every precinct, township, hamlet, and city of the United States. Certainly no one can say that the American soldier was overpaid when most of them served for a dollar a day and their keep, while many of their friends and relatives were working in the shipyards, munitions factories, and the like at exceptionally high wages and salaries.

As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, I supported so-called "bonus" legislation in the last session, and also in the House, being firmly convinced that this issue should be settled once and for all, and at a time when all of us desire increased purchasing power of the people. If this bill becomes a law—which I sincerely believe it will at a very early date—over $141,000,000 will be available to veterans in the great State of Illinois, and the sum of $3,691,583.16 in the Fourteenth Congressional District of Illinois, which I have the honor to represent in this body. My district is a combination of agriculture and industry, with the one strictly dependent upon the other, for the factories in my communities almost solely produce tools and machinery that are sold to the farmers. Thus, until the advent of the present administration, our factories did not afford much employment because of the depressed condition and lack of purchasing power by farmers throughout the Nation. I know that this sum, distributed as follows throughout the six counties of my district, will mean much not only to the holders of the certificates but to the businessmen with whom they trade:

Henderson County	162,744.12
McDonough County	506,679.66
Mercer County	308,524.14
Rock Island County	1,820,651.14
Warren County	403,162.30
Total	3,691,588.16

It will enable many of the veterans and their families to purchase the necessities of life, which they have denied themselves for many years.

I believe one of the outstanding features of this legislation is the privilege accorded to veterans who do not desire to obtain immediate payment, in that these certificates automatically become interest bearing at the rate of 3 percent per annum if application for payment is not filed prior to April 6, 1937, which, incidentally, is the twentieth anniversary of the United States' entry into the World War. I do not recall this feature in any previous bonus legislation, and know that such will lighten the burden on the Federal Treasury, at the same time benefiting those who do not find it necessary or desirable that they obtain full payment on their certificates immediately following the enactment of this measure.

THE BONUS BILL

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, there are some very compelling reasons which favor the working out of some plan whereby needy unemployed veterans might be given an opportunity to realize on their adjusted-service certificates. Personally I have known of many distressing cases, cases where veterans have already borrowed to the limit on their certificates, are now unable to secure employment, and though, eligible, have not applied for relief. They are therefore not eligible for relief jobs. It seems a bit ironical that an unemployed veteran in need should have in his pocket the obligation of his Government and lack the necessities of life for himself and family. Legislation which would make it possible for this veteran to realize on his certificate could, in my judgment, be passed through the Congress practically unanimously, and would undoubtedly receive the approval of the President. I would welcome an opportunity to vote for such legislation.

The present bill is far different from legislation such as I have herein suggested. I can point out very briefly a few obstacles that, to my mind, make it impossible to support the legislation:

First, the bill authorizes the payment of the certificates, which will require something over $2,000,000,000 and, although we have a deficit in the Federal Treasury and a mounting national debt, undertakes to make no provision for raising the necessary revenue. It has been suggested that the sponsors of this bill have in mind currency inflation as the method. On the floor of the House yesterday one of the leaders in the movement to pass this bill stated that as soon as this bill became a law an effort would be made, through the medium of a Democratic caucus, to commit the House of Representatives to the Patman plan to raise the revenue, which is direct currency inflation, and contrary to the President's policies, and would, in my judgment, entirely destroy the great strides made toward economic recovery.

Second. The bill provides that those veterans who hold certificates and who do not wish to cash them shall be given a Government 3-percent bond. This is intended, of course, to discourage the cashing of the certificates. The records show that over 400,000 veterans hold certificates aggregating approximately one-half billion dollars on which they have never exercised their right to obtain loans. Of course, it is a fair assumption that these veterans are not in need, and yet in face of present economic conditions we are giving these veterans who are not in need an additional consideration which amounts to approximately a 27-percent increase in the face value of their bonus certificates. This, to my mind, is entirely unwarranted and cannot be defended.

Third. This bill provides that those veterans who have borrowed on their certificates and who have not paid the interest on their loans shall be excused from the payment of the same, whereas it does not contain a provision reimbursing those veterans who have secured loans and who have paid their interest. Again there is an inconsistency and a discrimination which cannot be justified.

It is generally thought that after the passage of this bill in the House fundamental changes may be made which will remove many of these objections and which will permit the passage of legislation ultimately that will afford relief to those unemployed veterans who are in need. I cannot vote for this bill, though I devoutly hope that some logical and feasible plan may be worked out along the lines that I have herein suggested.

WORLD WAR VETERANS SHOULD GET THEIR ADJUSTED PAY IN CASH

Mr. SCHNEIDER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, since I first served in the House during the Sixty-eighth Congress I have always supported legislation to adjust the wartime pay of the World War veterans. My position has not been changed. This bill should be enacted into law and the certificates paid in cash. I am pleased that the three great veterans' organizations—the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Legion, and the Disabled American Veterans—have united in support of the bill now before Congress. With such united support by the veterans' organizations and those of us in Congress who have been making the fight for immediate cash payment to the veterans, prospects for a victory this time are greatly improved.

It has always been my view that use of the word "bonus" in connection with adjustment of the veterans' pay is a misrepresentation. Congress has long since recognized that the issuance of the adjusted-service certificates is not something extra, as is inferred by the term "bonus." On the contrary, it is a recognition of the justice of revising the salary schedule under which our soldiers served for $1 and $1.10 a day.

The first bills to adjust the pay of service men were introduced in 1919, immediately after the war. In 1922, payment of this obligation to the veterans was first approved by Congress, but was vetoed by the late President Harding. Two years later, in 1924, the issuance of the adjusted-service certificates was voted by Congress despite the veto of the late President Coolidge. This legislation postponed any payment to veterans until 1945. Those of us in Congress who felt that the soldiers should be paid in cash were not satisfied with this law, but it was the best we could get passed at that time.

Delay until 1945 constituted shabby treatment of those who had sacrified the most and risked their lives to defend the country. The unfairness becomes more apparent when it is recalled that when this "tombstone bonus" legislation was passed, those who had allowed their property to be used in war service had been paid in cash.

By 1924 practically all of the financial adjustments to war profiteers and others growing out of war services had been made. Seven thousand World War "cost plus" contractors had received billions of dollars, the railroad owners had been paid from one to two billion dollars, our foreign debtors had received debt-contract revisions benefiting them financially to the extent of $10,000,000,000. Under the friendly administration of their associate and colleague Secretary Andrew Mellon, the big income-tax payers received rebates of approximately $3,000,000,000 on income derived from war profits.

With such sums being ladled out lavishly by our Government to those who only allowed use of their property, with scant risk, those of us who were interested in securing some degree of justice for the veterans renewed the fight for immediate cash payment of the obligation to the veterans who had risked their lives.

In 1931 we succeeded in getting legislation passed allowing veterans to borrow about half of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, although again it was necessary to pass the bill over the veto of President Hoover. Later we succeeded in reducing the interest rates on these loans of their own money to the veterans.

Since authorization of the loans on certificates held by the service men, sentiment for immediate cash payment of this war debt, like the payments made to those whose property was used for war purposes, has grown each year. In 1932, the House passed a cash-payment bill, but it was defeated in the Senate. In 1935, immediate cash payment of the so-called "bonus" was authorized by the House by an overwhelming majority. The Senate concurred, but the bill was vetoed by President Roosevelt. The House voted to override the veto, but a scant few votes were lacking in the Senate to pass the bill over the veto.

Millions of veterans who have waited patiently for over 17 years for an adjustment of their pay are today in need of the funds, payment of which is authorized by this bill, Mr. Speaker. The outpouring of this money into our economic system will help bring recovery. In the State of Wisconsin alone there are 88,036 veterans who hold the certificates, the total amount due being $47,177,680.61. In the Eighth Congressional District, which I represent, the veterans hold certificates in the amounts designated in the table below:

Door County	291,930.20
Florence County	60,499.01
Forest County	178,510.61
Kewaunee County	257,490.08
Manitowoc County	942,069.75
Marinette County	538,357.68
Oconto County	423,653.62
Outagamie County	1,008,156.24

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us does not propose to pay the cash surrender value of the adjusted-service certificates only, but it provides for the payment now of more than will be due on them in 1945, inasmuch as it cancels the interest in default on loans already made, and proposes to pay interest on those certificates not cashed before April 1937.

The adjusted-service certificates are, in effect, 20-year endowment insurance policies, dated January 1, 1925, and maturing January 1, 1945. As stated by President Roosevelt in a letter to a veteran in December 1934:

> The amount which is printed upon the face of every adjusted-service certificate is not the amount of the basic or original bonus voted by Congress, but is an amount plus 25 percent added for deferred payment which, with interest at 4 percent compounded annually over a 20-year period, will produce the face or maturity value. This would seem to dispose of the question as to whether the obligation is immediately due.

The situation for all practical purposes is the same now as it was when President Roosevelt made that statement.

There is no method of payment provided for in the bill. The inflationists have been promised an opportunity later to try to put their method into effect. I am opposed to inflation.

The Government is already worse off than nothing by over $30,000,000,000. The recent decision of the Supreme Court in the A. A. A. case will add approximately a billion dollars to the deficit and the conference of mayors is asking for an additional appropriation for the Works Progress Administration of $2,340,000,000 to take care of the unemployed, who must be provided for in some way. That would add that much more to the deficit and no one can tell how much will be necessary to meet unforeseen emergencies which may arise.

There is a limit to the Government's credit. No one knows what that limit is, but every time it is increased from one to two billion dollars the limit is nearer at hand. It must admittedly be increased to keep the Government running and to take care of unavoidable obligations for some time to come. I am opposed to increasing the Government debt except in cases of absolute necessity. I shall vote for the motion providing that the certificates be paid out of the unexpended balances of appropriations heretofore made for emergency purposes, but if that fails, holding the views I do, I shall vote against the bill.

This is as much the veteran's country as anyone's. Our primary duty is to save the country for him as well as for the rest of America.

As far as the veterans on relief are concerned, the payment of their adjusted-service certificates now will simply be giving them a gold brick. As soon as they get their money they will be taken off relief until it is gone. It will mean the loss to them of the equity in their certificates and to their beneficiaries the loss of the insurance benefits now provided in the certificates.

REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM B. OLIVER

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I have asked this privilege to call the attention of the House to the return to his post of duty one of our most beloved, able, and distinguished Members, who has been absent from the House, lo, these many days, by reason of sickness which, thank God, has left no mark upon him save the silvering of his raven locks. He comes back in full strength and vigor to assume his duties among us, and I am sure that it is with glad hearts the Members of the House will welcome back that outstanding son of Alabama, Hon. WILLIAM B. OLIVER. [Applause.]

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill S. 3440, to amend certain acts relating to public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents, and acts amendatory thereof, be recommitted to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GEORGE N. PEEK'S STATEMENT

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, including therein a letter written by Mr. George N. Peek to the leaders of the farm conference in Washington this week. It sheds some light upon the solution of our present farm difficulties in view of the Supreme Court decision.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks and to include therein a letter from George N. Peek. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COFFEE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert, by request, a letter written by Mr. George N. Peek to the conference of farm leaders to be held in Washington this week. Mr. Peek was formerly Administrator of the A. A. A. and later adviser to the President on foreign trade.

While I do not concur in all of his statement I feel that his suggestions as to the solution of the farm problem are worthy of serious consideration.

His letter follows:

To the conference of farm leaders meeting in Washington January 10 and 11:

The decision of the Supreme Court regarding the Agricultural Adjustment Act has reopened for consideration the whole fundamental problem of agriculture. I have noticed a disposition in the press to assume that the decision renders the Federal Government impotent to assist agriculture, and that an amendment to the Constitution will be necessary if the Government is to deal adequately with the problem.

This I do not believe. To me that is a confession of despair. I see the Supreme Court decision as a guide post, not a barrier.

As I read the decision it does not prohibit the levying of excise taxes upon the processing of agricultural or other products, and it does not prohibit an appropriation under the general-welfare clause for the benefit of agriculture. What is prohibited is the absolute regulation, control, or regimentation of agriculture and other purely intrastate operations. The processing tax in the present case appears to fail simply because it is used as a means to such regulation, control, or regimentation. The court adopts the Hamiltonian interpretation of the general-welfare clause leaving Congress a very wide discretion respecting its application. The only limitation is that the reserved powers of the States may not be invaded.

It would seem that the way is open for a constructive program. We who have been through this whole farm fight can and should consider the decision as pointing the way to the development of a program of real and permanent value to agriculture, based upon the spirit of our American traditions and our Constitution. The proposal of a change in the Constitution offers no means for meeting the immediate situation. Furthermore, I question whether the long-term solution to the farm problem will be found down the precarious path of hasty constitutional amendment. It will be time to consider the possibility of a constitutional amendment when we have explored the avenues now open to us under our Constitution as it stands.

I have long been convinced that our national prosperity and political security are dependent primarily on farm prosperity; that the basis of farm prosperity is the achievement of a fair exchange value between domestic farm and industrial prices; that the most effective means of accomplishing this are:

(1) To preserve the American market; and

(2) To remove price-depressing farm surpluses.

The events of the past 3 years have served to strengthen these convictions.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act authorized a number of methods for meeting the problem of surpluses, including restriction of acreage and expansion of markets, domestic and foreign. However, the only method that the administration utilized to any extent was the dubious one of restricting and regimenting production. This particular method now has been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. There are other methods still available to us, notably those of recovering our home and foreign markets for agricultural products.

I voiced these thoughts in my radio talk of December 21, 1935, when I said that through reduction of agricultural tariffs under the so-called reciprocal trade-agreements program agriculture over wide areas is being asked to take the rap. I further pointed out that the trouble lies not in the fact so frequently stated that our foreign markets for agriculture are gone, but in the fact that those in the administration charged with the responsibility of disposing of our surpluses have refused to trade realistically in foreign markets and have prevented others from doing it when substantial trades were offered. I had in mind particularly the Departments of State and Agriculture. I made this clear in a public hearing before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry last February. Since that time the list of refusals and failures I then cited has grown. This is a matter which, in my opinion, calls for full and searching congressional inquiry.

To meet the immediate situation there are things that can and should be done, and done now:

1. Congress should appropriate funds to make good the contracts signed and executed in good faith under the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

2. The farmers should be given the full benefit of the domestic market. The importation of competitive agricultural products should be stopped. The attempt should be abandoned to effect a general reduction of the tariff through the medium of the so-called reciprocal trade agreements program and the unconditional most-favored-nation policy.

I do not feel that general tariff reduction is an appropriate policy at a time when 10,000,000 or more are out of work and when we are trying to restore domestic economic balance.

3. We should adopt, instead, a common-sense trading policy designed to dispose of our surpluses by trade in foreign markets, negotiating country by country on a selective basis both as to exports and imports; 30 percent of the customs revenues already have been earmarked for this purpose under section 32 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act amendments; it should be utilized to the fullest extent. Such a course would afford the basis for the development and expansion of our foreign trade in the general national interest.

4. To carry out such a policy we should set up an effective foreign-trade board, such as is contemplated in the Lewis bill (S. 3464), and get rid of the control of our foreign-trade policies by doctrinaires, amateurs, and careerists acting free of congressional restraint.

As regards the long pull toward a permanent farm program, it is my belief that the general principles underlying the fight for the McNary-Haugen legislation are deserving of careful consideration. Changes of detail may be needed to meet the requirements of the altered world situation, but the fundamental idea of helping the farmer under our American protective system to dispose of his surpluses in an orderly manner analogous to that available to industry is thoroughly sound.

In addition, we should seek and develop new uses for agricultural products in industry and commerce. We should encourage by all proper means the production in the United States of agricultural commodities which hitherto we have had to import, and, in cooperation with the States, we should endeavor in every practicable way to conserve and develop our soil and land resources.

These are questions which I hope your conference will consider before committing itself to a line of action. We are still free to act effectively for agriculture. I believe that if we act wisely, real agricultural recovery lies ahead.

GEORGE N. PEEK.

GOLD IN THE TREASURY

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, at the direction of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, I present a privileged resolution and report, House Resolution 384, and move to lay the same on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 384

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the House of Representatives the following information:

1. The amount of gold purchased by the Treasury Department under the authority of section 8 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934.
2. The price at which such gold has been purchased.
3. The amount of gold now stored in the Treasury Department.
4. The amount of any expenditures since March 4, 1933, for providing storage facilities for the gold supply of the United States, and the location of such storage facilities.
5. The amount, if any, which has been allocated for the erection of additional storage facilities, and the designated location of such additional storage facilities.
6. The extent to which the price of gold in foreign countries has increased since the Treasury Department began its present gold-purchase program.
7. The ratio of the gold reserve of the United States to that of the rest of the world.
8. The result of the administration of section 8 of the Gold Reserve Act of 1934.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York.

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to was laid on the table.

UNCONSTITUTIONAL LAWS

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include an editorial from the Portland News-Telegram.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Portland (Oreg.) News-Telegram, under date of January 3, 1936, entitled "Unconstitutional Laws." This editorial was written by Mr. Tom E. Shea, editor of the Portland (Oreg.) News-Telegram, and comes at an appropriate time, inasmuch as the Supreme Court of the United States has subsequently held invalid the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I believe that this editorial is one which should be studied and seriously considered by every Member of the House of Representatives, as it contains an admonition which should be heeded by every Member, regardless of political affiliation.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Portland (Oreg.) News-Telegram]

UNCONSTITUTIONAL LAWS

Now that the second half of the Seventy-fourth Congress is under way, we'd like to play the part of the grandstand quarterback and suggest that the lawmaking squads adopt a new system of maneuver in the form of a New Year resolution, namely, that they discard their ground-losing spread of passing unconstitutional laws.

Perhaps one of the greatest economic abuses of recent years has been the time, energy, and money wasted on preparation and enforcement of unconstitutional laws, as well as time and money wasted in preparation of those affected by such laws.

First, there was the N. R. A. Now the Bankhead, Guffey, and Wagner laws are clearly on the way to the scrap heap.

Perhaps the most unforgivable angle is that Congressmen admitted voting for laws they knew were unconstitutional in order to please constituents. That is wrong, any way you look at it.

A Congressman has a right to favor amendments to the Constitution. He has a right to explain in voting against a bill that he is for its principles and opposed to it on grounds of constitutionality. But it is hard to see how he has a right to willfully act against the Constitution.

The record of Congress is particularly blackened by unanimous Supreme Court decisions, as with the N. R. A., concurred in by judges of all shades of political belief.

It is plain that the Supreme Court is definitely on record as supporting a broad interpretation of the Constitution to the effect that prices, production, and labor relations are matters for State rather than Federal jurisdiction.

It clearly follows that those who believe that the Federal Government should have more power have one plain course before them, amendment of the Constitution—the course followed in securing repeal of prohibition.

Meanwhile, there certainly should be a moratorium on the passage of unconstitutional laws. Otherwise, it is not improbable that the public would be aroused to the point of putting through a constitutional amendment providing for judicial review of laws before they can be enforced.

THE TOWNSEND PLAN

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the Townsend plan.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSAY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by me on the 18th day of December 1935 to Mr. Earnest F. Millan, 225 Jefferson Street, Fairmont, W. Va.:

MY DEAR SIR: Since the Townsend plan has aroused so much interest in the public mind, I believe that you and the public generally are entitled to know exactly where I stand on this question.

Of course, you already know that I am in favor of social security, having voted for the bill which passed at the last session of Congress. While this bill does not provide absolute security, it is a step in the right direction; and until the 10,000,000 men out of employment are given the opportunity to secure employment, the present law, to my mind, is as far as Congress can or dare go along this line, if we are to have any regard for the maintenance of our national credit and our ability to pay.

The Townsend plan would provide a pension of $200 per month for each and every person past 60 years of age. There are nearly 11,000,000 persons in the United States who have reached this age, so that full payment under this plan would reach the staggering total of $26,400,000,000 per annum.

To raise this great sum Dr. Townsend proposes a 2-percent sales tax on all sales in the United States.

The good doctor bases his revenue hopes upon the bank turnovers of 1934, which totaled $356,880,000,000 (Federal Reserve figures); and if you follow the doctor's figures and add 10 percent for other turn-overs not reported, his 2-percent tax on these figures would only have raised for his fund eight billion six hundred million instead of his required amount, twenty-six billion four hundred million. To raise his twenty-six billion four hundred million for his pension fund would require a per-capita tax of $220 upon each person in the United States.

Last year our miners, millworkers, and others earned only an average of $700 each. How such workers could stand a tax of $220 for each member of their family has not been explained by the doctor or his supporters. Of course, such a tax—like all other taxes—must come from the earnings of the people.

Last year the total earnings of every person, corporation, and business in the United States amounted to the gross sum of $50,000,000,000. The Townsend plan would take half of this and pay it to 10 percent of our people, which would necessarily require the remaining 90 percent of our people to get along as best they could on the other half.

There has been much talk recently about our national debt, which, in round numbers, is less than $30,000,000,000. If we really want to try out the doctor's theory of taxation, let's burden ourselves with it for 1 year and give it a try-out; raise $26,000,000,000, pay off the national debt, and start again at scratch. Then we will be in a much better position financially and otherwise to determine whether the people are really desirous of trying out the doctor's theories.

Of course, you know how sales taxes are pyramided and additional charges added. Such taxes are too often used as an excuse for added costs above the tax.

Let's take, for instance, meat and examine what such a tax would mean in increased prices on this material food product. When the drover purchases his cattle from the farmer, 2 percent will be added. When the drover sells his cattle to the packing house, another 2 percent will be added. When the packing house fills the order of the butcher or dealer, another 2 percent will have to be added; and when the dealer or butcher sells to the consumer, another 2 percent must be added. And so it goes all along the line—pyramid after pyramid—until the prices of all products will rise until your dollar couldn't purchase a ham sandwich.

I haven't time to call your attention to the fact that business, in its effort to avoid such a burden of taxation, will use and devise every means to escape the repeated payments of such tax, and will necessarily eliminate the middleman entirely, which will have the effect of only adding probably a million more people to our already large list of unemployed.

Upon this question I stand with the liberal Franklin D. Roosevelt, who recognizes the necessity for old-age pensions; who desires to build up an old-age pension system along rational and practical lines. The administration's social-security program, so far, has provided only a meager beginning, but it is the only proper answer to this question. It recognizes the need for old-age pensions and seeks to satisfy that need in proportion to the Nation's ability to do so. By ganging up on the New Deal in order to destroy this great measure of the present administration, the tories sow the wind, and, if Dr. Townsend should be able to force his theories through Congress, would reap the whirlwind; and if he should be successful, let it be put down on the record that the gangers-up made it possible.

Yours very truly,

ROBERT L. RAMSAY.

EXPLANATION OF VOTE

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

S. S. "PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT", January 10, 1936.

Congressman KOPPLEMANN,
House of Representatives:

Announce me for bonus, as always. Better, but still under doctor's care.

WILLIAM CITRON.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LEWIS of Maryland, for 2 days, on account of illness.

To Mr. FERNANDEZ, for 20 days, on account of important official business.

THE LATE HON. WESLEY LLOYD

Mr. SAMUEL B. HILL. Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to announce to the House the sad intelligence of the death of Hon. WESLEY LLOYD, a Representative in Congress from the Sixth District of Washington. His death occurred about 6 o'clock this morning at his home in the city of Washington, and was entirely unexpected, as no notice of any previous illness had come to me or to other Members of the House.

In his death the State of Washington has lost one of its most useful citizens. In the short time in which he served in the House he had established himself as an able statesman, conscientious, patriotic, and always diligent in the discharge of his duties. We in that State feel keenly the loss of this good citizen. Personally, I feel deeply the loss of a most true and loyal friend.

On a future occasion I shall ask the privilege of addressing the House on the useful life and noble character of my beloved friend and our departed colleague.

Mr. Speaker, I present a resolution, which I send to the Speaker's desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 390

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WESLEY LLOYD, a Representative from the State of Washington.

Resolved, That a committee of four Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as members of the committee to attend the funeral of the late Honorable WESLEY LLOYD the following Members of the House of Representatives: Mr. WALLGREN, Mr. SMITH of Washington, Mr. ZIONCHECK, and Mr. EKWALL.

ADJOURNMENT

The Clerk continued the reading of the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the House, in accordance with its order previously entered, adjourned until Monday, January 13, 1936, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, who art ever more ready to hear than we to pray and art wont to give us more than either we desire or deserve, pour upon us the abundance of Thy mercy and forgive us all our sin.

Help us to realize in private and in public work that virtue alone, in the face of indecision, is firm and changeless and will bear us o'er life's surges gallantly.

Subdue in every nation all unhallowed thirst for conquest and vainglorious emprise; break down in every one of us the idols of our pride and shatter our self-love, that all mankind may dwell secure in peace and fellowship.

Thee only let us worship; Thee only let us serve, for His sake who sought not His own will but Thine alone. Amen.

COL. CHARLES A. LINDBERGH

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, on Monday last, during the course of remarks made by me with reference to Col. Charles A. Lindbergh, I attempted to quote from memory an editorial which had been published in a New York newspaper on the occasion of Colonel Lindbergh's celebrated solo flight across the Atlantic. I inadvertently ascribed the editorial to the New York Tribune. I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. Frank M. O'Brien, editor of the New York Sun, enclosing a correct copy of the editorial article. I ask that Mr. O'Brien's letter, together with the editorial, may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SUN,
New York, January 11, 1936.

The Honorable HENRY ASHURST,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Having noted your remarks in the RECORD of January 6, I am sending herewith a proof of the editorial article Lindbergh Flies Alone, which was written by Harold M. Anderson, of the staff of the Sun, and which was published while Colonel Lindbergh was still in flight.

Very truly yours,

FRANK M. O'BRIEN, Editor.

[From the New York Sun of May 21, 1927]

LINDBERGH FLIES ALONE

Alone?

Is he alone at whose right side rides courage, with skill within the cockpit and faith upon the left? Does solitude surround the brave when adventure leads the way and ambition reads the dials? Is there no company with him for whom the air is cleft by daring and the darkness is made light by emprise?

True, the fragile bodies of his fellows do not weigh down his plane; true, the fretful minds of weaker men are lacking from his crowded cabin; but as his airship keeps her course he holds communion with those rarer spirits that inspire to intrepidity and by their sustaining potency give strength to arm, resource to mind, content to soul.

Alone? With what other companions would that man fly to whom the choice were given?

THE LATE SENATOR HUEY P. LONG

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a radiogram from the President of the Senate of Paraguay expressing condolences on the death of Hon. Huey P. Long, late a Senator from the State of Louisiana, which was ordered to lie on the table.

CLAIM OF WILLIAM L. JENKINS, ESQ.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I enclose herewith a report which the Secretary of State has addressed to me in regard to a claim of William L. Jenkins, Esq., formerly consul of the United States at Trebizond, Turkey, for the sum of $481.50 appropriated for his relief in Public Act No. 519, approved July 3, 1930, and used by the General Accounting Office as a set-off against an amount of $2,000 due from him for his failure to properly account for the proceeds of a draft in that sum drawn by him on December 8, 1916.

Legislation authorizing and directing the Comptroller General of the United States to credit Mr. Jenkins' accounts with the sum of $2,000 is contained in Private Act No. 30 of May 8, 1935. No provision was made in this act for refund of the sum of $481.50 used as a set-off, but in view of the fact that the Congress enacted legislation providing for reimbursement of the amount of his loss, namely, $481.50, and for crediting his accounts with the sum of $2,000, it was evidently intended that he be fully compensated. It is, therefore, recommended that legislation be enacted providing payment in the amount of $481.50 for the relief of the claimant.

THE DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. GIBSON. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and appropriately referred a resolution of protest by a Grange organization against the Canadian treaty as it affects the dairy industry of the country.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas our Government in the past has attempted to help agriculture by raising the price of agricultural products; and

Whereas we believe that the prices of agricultural products are not yet equal with industry and we believe that the treaty recently enacted between the United States and Canada will have the opposite effect upon the dairy industry of the United States and in particular upon the agricultural income of the Northeastern States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, the members of Franklin County Pomona Grange now in session, do hereby protest against this action taken by our President and request its repeal; also be it

Resolved, That we send by telegraph a copy of these resolutions to our State master now attending the National Grange in California, a copy be forwarded to A. H. Packard, president of our State Farm Bureau, also a copy forwarded to our Members in Congress.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I introduce a bill which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill represents the composite views of many who have been working on the bonus question. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] join me in the introduction of the bill. It has the approval of the leader on the Democratic side.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill just introduced by the Senator from Mississippi and other Senators be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3653) to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill to provide for the immediate payment of World War adjusted-service certificates, for the cancelation of unpaid interest accrued on loans secured by such certificates, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding the provisions of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended (U. S. C., 1934 edition, title 38, ch. 11), the adjusted-service certificates issued under the authority of such act are hereby declared to be immediately payable. Payments on account of such certificates shall be made in the manner hereinafter provided upon application therefor to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and upon surrender of the certificates and all rights thereunder (with or without the consent of the beneficiaries thereof). The payment in each case shall be in an amount equal to the face value of the certificate, except that if, at the time of application for payment under this act, the principal and unpaid interest accrued prior to October 1, 1931, with respect to any loan upon any such certificate has not been paid in full by the veteran (whether or not the loan has matured), then the Administrator shall (1) pay or discharge such unpaid principal and interest as is necessary to make the certificate available for payment under this act; (2) deduct such unpaid principal and so much of such unpaid interest as accrued prior to October 1, 1931, from the amount of the face value of the certificate; and (3) certify to the Secretary of the Treasury as payable an amount equal to the difference between the face value of the certificate and the amount so deducted.

SEC. 2. In the case of each loan heretofore made pursuant to law by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and/or by any national bank or any bank or trust company incorporated under the laws of any State, Territory, possession, or the District of Columbia, upon the security of an adjusted-service certificate any interest unpaid accrued subsequent to September 30, 1931, that has been or, in consequence of existing law would be charged against the face value of such certificate, shall be canceled insofar as the veteran is concerned, notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary. Any interest on any such loan payable to any such bank or trust company shall be paid by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs.

In the case of any such loan which is unpaid and held by a bank or trust company at the time of filing an application under this act, the bank or trust company holding the note and certificate shall, upon notice from the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, present them to the Administrator for payment to the bank or trust company, in full satisfaction of its claim for the amount of unpaid principal and unpaid interest, except that if the bank or trust company, after such notice, fails to present the certificate and note to the Administrator within 15 days after the mailing of the notice, such interest shall be paid only up to the fifteenth day after the mailing of such notice.

SEC. 3. (a) An application under this act for payment of a certificate may be made and filed at any time before the maturity of the certificate (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. An application made by a person other than a representative authorized by such regulations shall be held void.

(b) If the veteran dies after the application is made and before it is filed it may be filed by any person. If the veteran dies after the application is made it shall be valid if the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs finds that it bears the bona-fide signature of the applicant, discloses an intention to claim the benefits of this act, and is filed before payment is made to the beneficiary. If the death occurs after the application is filed but before the receipt of the payment under this act, or if the application is filed after the death occurs but before mailing of the check in payment to the beneficiary under section 501 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, payment under this act shall be made to the estate of the veteran irrespective of any beneficiary designation. If the veteran dies without making a valid application under this act no payment under this act shall be made. If the veteran dies on or after the passage of this act without having filed an application under section 1, in making any settlement there shall be deducted on account of any loan made on an adjusted-service certificate only interest accruing prior to October 1, 1931.

(c) Where the records of the Veterans' Administration show that an application, disclosing an intention to claim the benefits of this act, has been filed and the application cannot be found, such application shall be presumed, in the absence of affirmative evidence to the contrary, to have been valid when originally filed.

(d) If at the time this act takes effect a veteran entitled to receive an adjusted-service certificate has not made application therefor he shall be entitled, upon application made under section 302 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, to receive, at his option, under such rules and regulations as the Administrator may prescribed, either the certificate under section 501 of such act, as amended, or payment under this act.

SEC. 4. The amount certified pursuant to section 1 of this act shall be paid to the veteran or his estate on or after June 15, 1936, by the Secretary of the Treasury by the issuance of bonds of the United States, registered in the name of the veteran only, in denominations of $50 or multiples thereof having a total face value up the highest multiple of $50 in the amount certified as due the veteran, and the difference between the amount certified as due the veteran and the face amount of the bonds so issued shall be paid to the veteran or his estate by the Secretary of the Treasury out of the fund created by section 505 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended. The bonds shall be dated June 15, 1936, and shall mature on June 15, 1945, but shall be redeemable at the option of the veteran or his estate at any time, at such places, including post offices, as the Secretary of the Treasury may designate. Such bonds shall be issued under the authority and subject to the provisions of the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and shall not be transferable, assignable, subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process and shall be payable only to the veteran or in case of death or incompetence of the veteran, to the representative of his estate. Interest on each bond issued hereunder shall accrue at the rate of 3 percent per annum from June 15, 1936, to date of maturity or payment of the principal of the bond, whichever is earlier, and will be paid with such principal: Provided, however, That no interest will be paid on any bond redeemed prior to June 15, 1937. The provisions of this section shall be carried out subject to regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury to be issued from time to time to effectuate the purposes of this act.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to redeem from the United States Government life-insurance fund all adjusted-service certificates held by that fund on account of loans made thereon, and to pay to the United States Government life-insurance fund the amount of the outstanding liens against such certificates, including all interest due or accrued, together with such amounts as may be due under subdivision (m) of section 502 of the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to make such payment by issuing, to the United States Government life insurance fund, bonds of the United States which shall bear interest at the rate of 4½ percent per annum. No such bonds shall mature or be callable until the expiration of a period of at least 10 years from date of issue, except that any such bond shall be redeemed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the principal and accrued interest thereon paid to the United States Government life-insurance fund at any time upon certification by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs that the amount represented by such bond is required to meet current liabilities. Bonds issued for the purposes of this section shall be issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, subject to the provisions of this section.

SEC. 6. The adjusted-service certificate fund is hereby made available for payments authorized by this act.

SEC. 7. Notwithstanding the provisions of Public Law No. 262, Seventy-fourth Congress, approved August 12, 1935, no deductions on account of any indebtedness of the veteran to the United States, except on account of any lien against the adjusted-service certificate authorized by law, shall be made from the adjusted-service credit or from any amounts due under the World War Adjusted Compensation Act, as amended, or this act.

SEC. 8. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. If any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, is held invalid, the remainder of the act, and the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 10. This act may be cited as the Adjusted Compensation Payment Act, 1936.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, in line with the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD a statement which I am giving to the press at this time.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT ISSUED BY SENATOR PAT HARRISON, CHAIRMAN OF THE FINANCE COMMITTEE, RELATIVE TO THE BONUS

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 13, 1936.

The bill introduced today represents the labor of many of us who have been striving to reconcile the differences and obtain legislation that would be fair to the ex-service man, and at the same time safeguard the interest of the Government. Particularly active with me have been Senators BYRNES, of South Carolina, CLARK, of Missouri, STEIWER, of Oregon, and ROBINSON, of Arkansas.

The bill is not essentially different in the benefits granted from the one which has just passed the House, but will, it is believed, provide a more practicable method for making settlement.

This proposal provides for the payment of the face value of all adjusted-service certificates less loans which have been made on them with no interest charges after September 30, 1931. We have adopted this date for stopping interest charges because it is the one which was in the bill which passed both Houses of the Congress last year. It does not cancel to the veteran any interest paid or contracted to be paid by the veteran prior to October 1, 1931.

In addition to the difference between the cancelation of the interest feature in this bill and the House bill, it is proposed that instead of checks being given to veterans in payment of their adjusted-service certificates, as the House bill provides, that the veterans receive bonds the value of which will increase from year to year by the accumulation of interest at the rate of 3 percent per annum and will run for 10 years. These bonds, however, will not be of the ordinary type, but the veterans will be given the special privilege of cashing them in at some designated place in their local community at any time and without any red tape at their face value plus any accumulations of interest. The bonds are to be registered in the name of the veteran and are nonnegotiable. The bill provides safeguards insuring to the veteran that he can secure payment in full at any time he desires to cash his bond. Thus the veterans, after they receive these bonds, have the option of retaining them and by so doing providing a nest egg and a protection for their families and themselves, or, if they desire the cash, they have only to present them for redemption and the cash will be immediately paid to them. In offering such a settlement to this controversial problem of long standing we feel that we have provided a method whereby the interests of the veterans who have desired to hold their certificates for the benefit of their families will be fully protected and the opportunity given to those who desire cash to get what they want.

It is our thought that a great number of veterans will hold the bonds, rather than cash them in, as the investment provided is an especially attractive one. Bonds of the United States paying a 3-percent interest rate are selling at an appreciable premium, and were these bonds negotiable they would unquestionably sell considerably above par, but we have purposely made them nonnegotiable so that only the veterans to whom they are issued may enjoy the extraordinary privileges granted and in order that no third parties may reap any gains or benefits because of the adoption of the bond method of making settlement.

The bill differs from the House bill in that it provides that no deduction shall be made on account of any indebtedness of the veteran to the United States except on account of a lien against the adjusted-compensation certificate.

At the same time, to the extent that the bonds are held by the veterans, it will, in my opinion, make unnecessary any additional public financing by the Treasury. It is the belief that under this method of payment it will be unnecessary to provide at this session for any additional taxes.

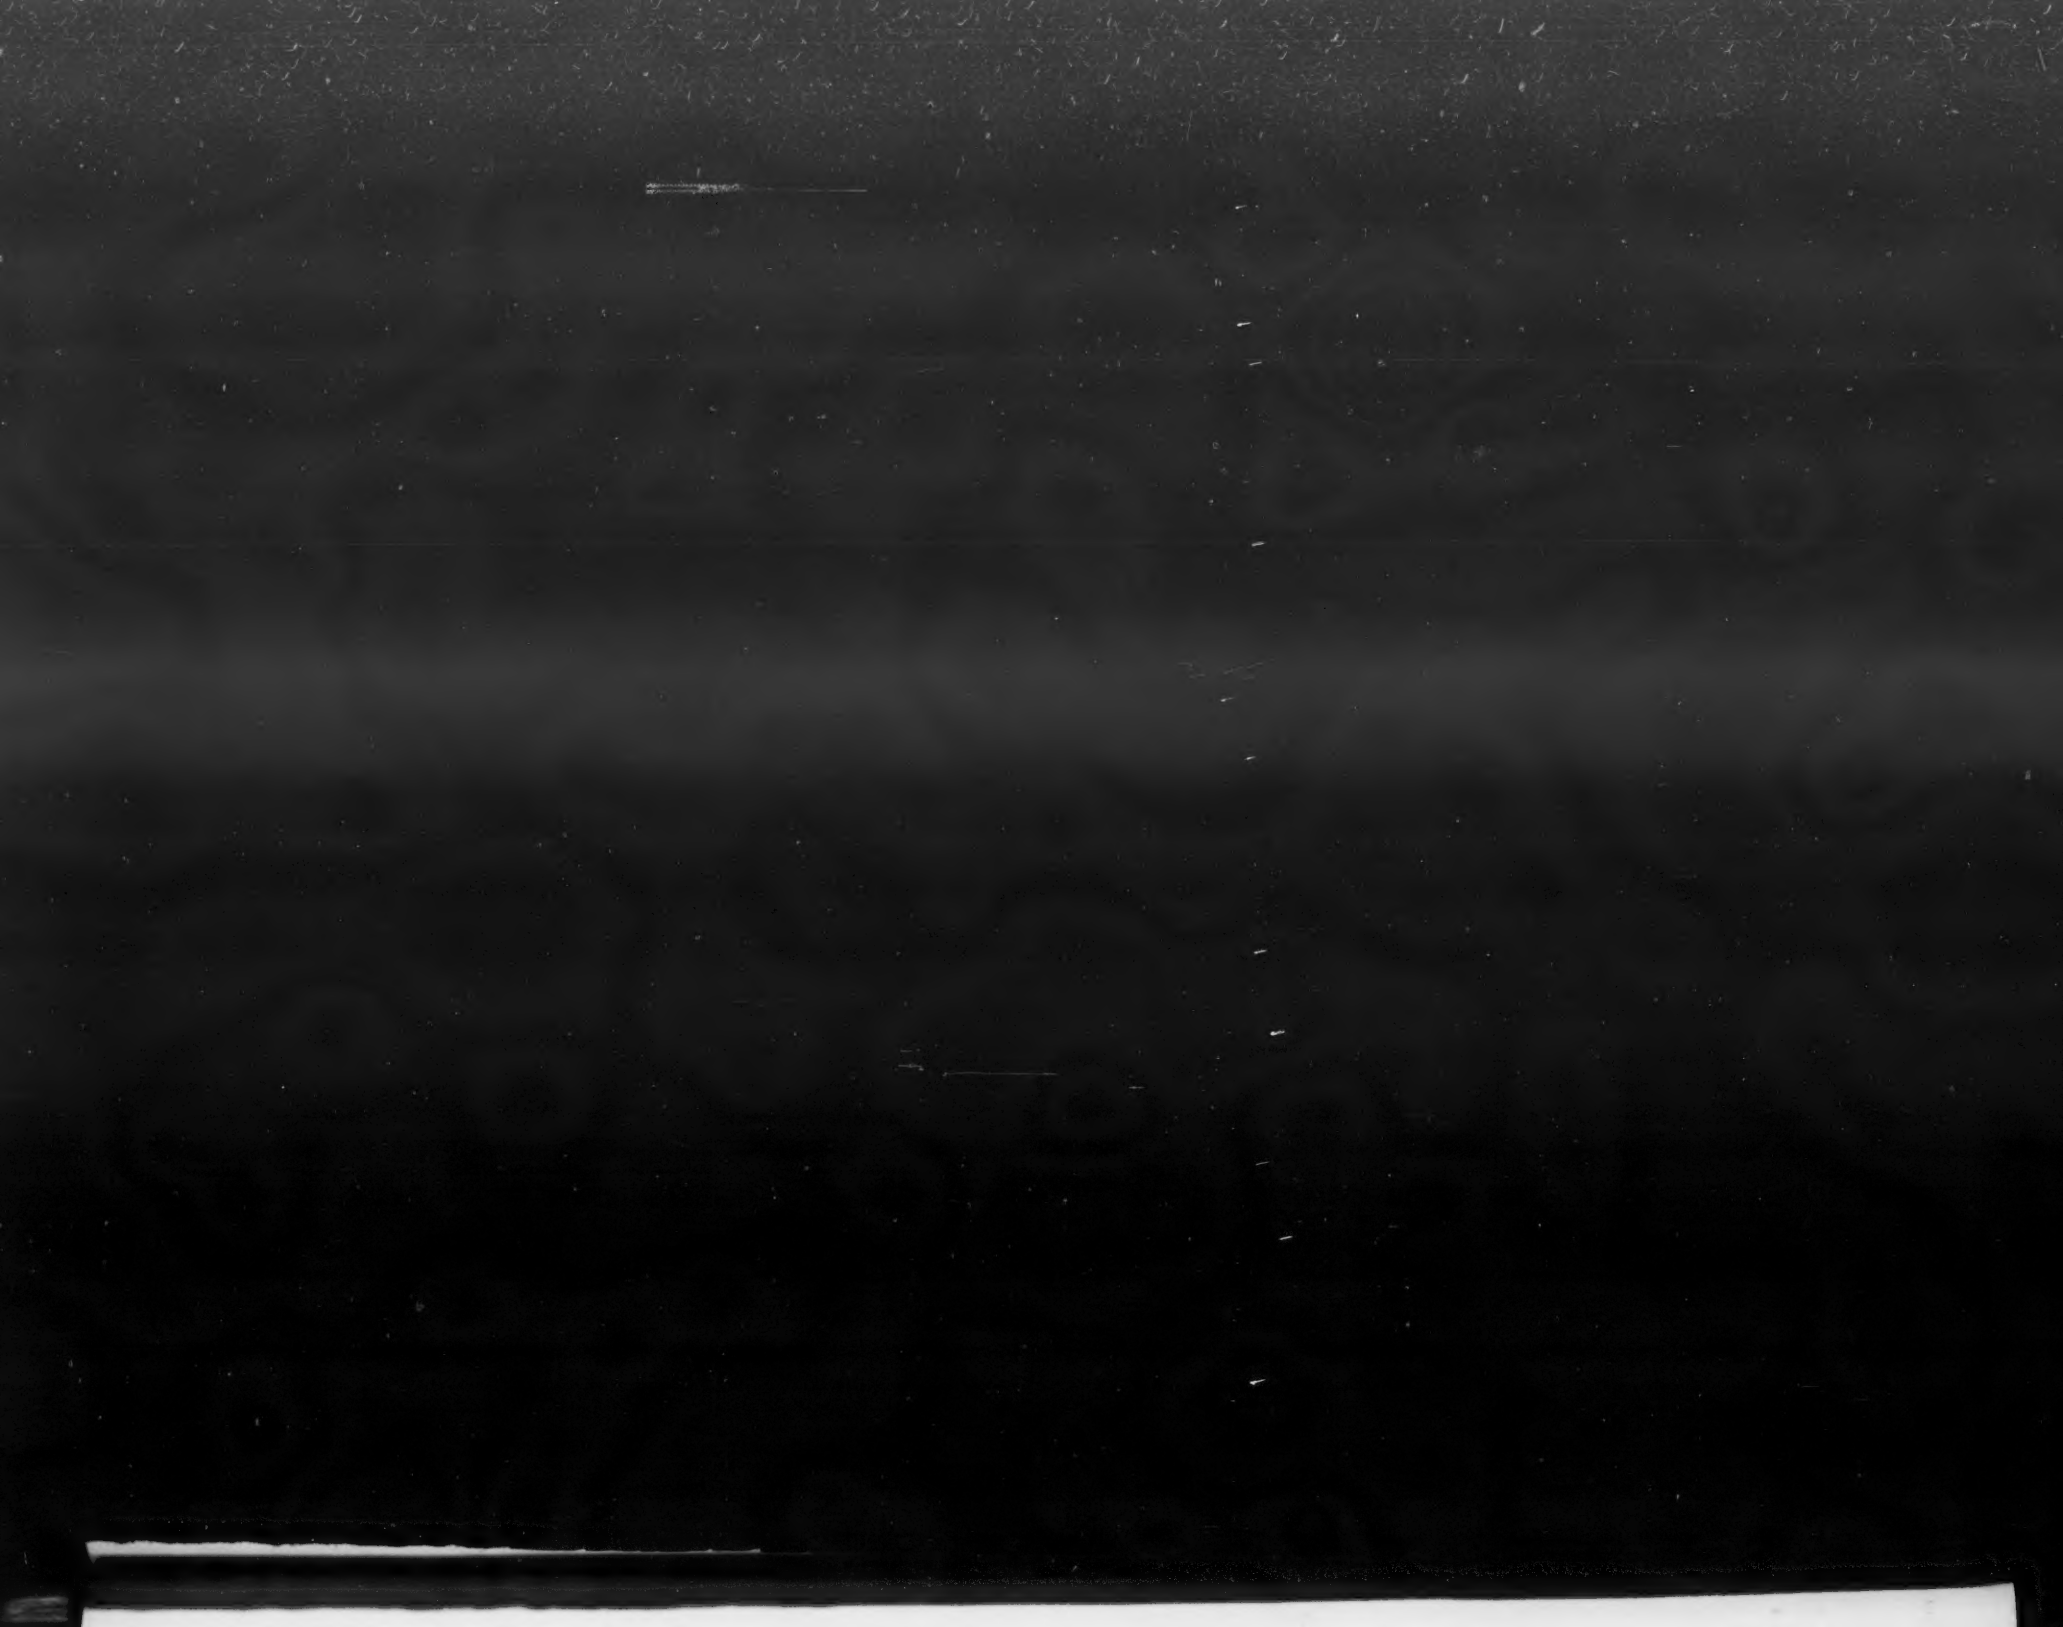
ADDRESS TO THE DEMOCRATIC NATIONAL COMMITTEE BY THE POSTMASTER GENERAL

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, on January 9 the Honorable James A. Farley, Postmaster General, at a meeting of the Democratic National Committee in the Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C., delivered a most eloquent and interesting address, and I ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:



The Democratic National Committee is here today to select the city in which our convention is to be held and to make preparations for a campaign that in some respects will be different from any Presidential campaign in our political history.

Theoretically, the combat waged every 4 years centers around two conflicting policies of government, with the candidates of the two parties each representing one side of the controversy.

The campaign of 1936 will not be this. It will be a campaign of defamation on the side of our adversaries, a simple effort to break down the faith of the people in a President under whose leadership the Democratic administration has lifted our Nation out of the depths of despair to the broad way of hope and set it on the high road to renewed prosperity. He has accomplished this through certain legislative measures, startling only in the circumstances that they departed from the policy of drifting, which had led us into all our troubles; policies novel only because they were conceived and executed in the service of our whole people and not for the benefit of the greedy, selfish interests which dominated the Government from the time that Woodrow Wilson left the White House to the day Franklin D. Roosevelt took the wheel.

Let me tell you now that our opponents will make this the bitterest and certainly the dirtiest political struggle that any of us here can remember.

I have not the slightest doubt of its outcome, but I feel it my duty to warn you that you will have to combat misrepresentations, outright lies, and every form of foul whisperings you can imagine. Moreover, you must realize that the assault of the Roosevelt administration will be financed with the largest slush fund on record, contributed for the most part by those who have neither public conscience nor private scruple. They are men who are interested only in getting back the inordinate privileges which have enabled them to exploit the people in the past and who will hit below the belt, or do anything else that they think may give them hope of regaining their pirate ascendency. In the ranks of our foes you will find not only the financial gangsters whose extortions were so largely responsible for bringing on the Hoover panic but others, who for one reason or another hate Franklin D. Roosevelt, or who are accessories of the exploiters.

Our adversaries are trying to represent the party conflict as a battle between the business interests of the country and a mythical group bent on substituting a socialistic, communistic system for the economic processes that have made this Nation the greatest, wealthiest commonwealth in the world. It is a ridiculous perversion of the facts. A great proportion of our commercial and industrial leaders are with the President as sincerely as they were when they rallied to his support in 1932. Why shouldn't they be? What business is there in all our vast country that has not been helped by the present administration?

There were 10,000 bank failures in the years preceding the advent of Roosevelt to the White House, each carrying down with it a multitude of individuals involving in the wreck thousands of commercial enterprises, great and small.

How many bank failures have there been since the President took charge and rebuilt the whole banking structure? In the 3 years preceding this administration there were innumerable business collapses. In the 3-year period of the Roosevelt regime there were not half so many.

What accounts for the difference? Does the present solid foundation of business, as contrasted with the hideous insecurity of the previous period, come as the result of cosmic rays or black magic? Has there been any epoch-making change in world conditions to account for our recovery? No. The only difference is that we have had at the head of our Government a President wise enough to see what had to be done and courageous enough to do it. It is that program, and that alone, that saved America.

Our adversaries characteristically are using every agency at their command to give the impression of division in the Democratic ranks. A little while ago they were gravely announcing that a third-party move was impending. You know what that amounts to. Whenever some irresponsible adventurer thinks he sees an opportunity to launch a political racket, which means whenever he scents the possibility of getting financial backing, our Republican friends announce the advent of a Democratic revolt. Political changes do not come about that way. Forty years ago the same element that has now taken over the Republican high command tried it. They instituted a third ticket, and I doubt if half of you—and you are adepts in politics—can even recall the candidates of that enterprise. They spend a lot of money, as the Du Pont-financed Liberty League is doing now, without any effect on the result of the election.

I only recall this illuminating incident of history to bring home to you what sort of a campaign this is going to be—what sort of tactics you will be obliged to meet.

Nobody knows who will be the Republican nominee. Least of all the Republicans. They dare not nominate Herbert Hoover, the most eminent proponent of the do-nothing policy that brought on the great economic calamity, for they know that when the people in 1932 cast the Hoover administration overboard they registered more than a political decision. The people then pronounced a verdict, not only against the then President but against the whole reactionary group. They cannot nominate Senator BORAH because that veteran of 30 years of political battling must be poison to the crowd whose league is championing the crusade against all that is being done to keep the country safe from the depredations of its sponsors. Inevitably they will be driven to some colorless individual, unknown until paid propaganda builds up a fabulous picture and presents it to the people as someone worthy to direct the destinies of the United States.

There can be but one honest issue in this campaign, and that is whether President Roosevelt has done well or ill by his country.

The answer to that great question stares at you today from the pages of every newspaper in the land—not from the editorial pages, which mostly echo the desires of the big-business group; not from the propaganda pages, which misrepresent and libel the existing administration. The reflection I speak of is found in those commonplace pages which present the direct reports of the Nation's business.

The balance sheets of industry, commerce, and agriculture tell the story. The market quotations on commodities and securities cannot be faked or distorted. These figures will tell you that the national wealth has increased $22,000,000,000 over their market values on the day our President took office.

We have traveled upward a great way since March 4, 1933.

Our adversaries cannot deny the facts. They cannot escape the logic of the black entries that have wiped out the red entries of the Hoover period. Being unable to deny the recurrence of prosperity, they are forced to the alternative of declaring that it was not because of, but in spite of, the Roosevelt policies that confidence has succeeded despair; that our Government bonds are selling above instead of below par; that people are buying again and are able to pay for what they buy. This happy outcome was because of Roosevelt. It was in spite of the furious clamors of those who have tried to hinder him at every step, ever since the increase of business has rescued them from their panic fears.

Roosevelt has done nothing that he did not promise to do when they came to him begging for action—any action—that would save them from the consequences of their own conscienceless greed. He told them in the beginning what his program was, and they were almost hysterical in their satisfaction that someone had come to the head of the Government with a plan, for they had no plan, and they saw in the President the people had chosen their one hope of escaping absolute chaos. But as soon as they felt the ground under their feet again, as soon as they felt strong enough to stand alone, they began their effort to destroy the man who had saved them.

Aesop told the story a couple of thousand years ago—you know the one about the farmer who found a frozen snake in the barnyard and brought it in and warmed it back to life, and the snake bit the farmer's children.

Suppose today—instead of immediately after his inauguration—President Roosevelt found it necessary to close all the banks. What would be the reaction of the great financial concerns, utility corporations, and the others who form the backbone of the opposition? They had nothing but applause and gratitude for his action then. You heard no talk then about regimenting the farmers, shackling industry, flouting the Constitution, and all the rest of the stuff that is being ground out in the effort to discredit the administration.

They have talked about the President not keeping his pledges. What has he failed to do that he agreed to do when he announced himself 100 percent for the Chicago platform? First of all he promised that nobody should starve in this country. That was his first and greatest declaration, and one that transcended every other. He has kept that promise, and his reward is to be accused of extravagance, to have his administration pictured as one run by hare-witted idealists who are shoveling out the people's money with no desire but to get rid of it.

When the people asked for bread and a chance to work, he could not deny them with the arguments now advanced by the critics of the New Deal. Franklin D. Roosevelt, may it be said to his everlasting credit, will never plead the statute of limitations against a hungry man.

He promised a stable currency. The American dollar is preeminent today as a money unit. The credit of our Nation is so high that every country in Europe is sending over millions of dollars every week to buy American goods and invest in American securities, and our 3-percent national bonds are worth in the open market more than were worth the high-interest bonds of 3 years ago. And what is the President's reward for having brought about this state of national solvency? Why, they call him inflationist and speak of his taking us off the gold standard as if that were something evil, revolutionary, inexcusable. Yet England, to which his critics refer as an example of all that is wise and just in recovery, preceded us off the gold standard by 2 years.

He subscribed to the platform pledge for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, which his predecessor even during the '32 campaign had not the courage either to espouse or oppose. That policy not only rid us of the horrible effects of bootlegging, with its murderous gang wars and its almost Nation-wide corruption, but it reestablished industries, the revenues of which had been going to outlaws and the taxes on which were the bribes to city and State and even to national officials.

The Republican National Committee and its acknowledged, or unacknowledged, allies are bent only on the destruction of the Democratic Party and democratic principles. If anybody believed them, it would appear that the Roosevelt administration was accomplishing nothing, that its public works were limited to raking leaves or mowing grass or weeds from streets of cities and performing other trivialities of little worth and no permanent advantage. They never mention the vast number of public buildings that have been and are being erected; of the great dams that are harnessing our rivers; of the thousands of leagues of good roads being laid, the bridges being built, and the innumerable other projects that add to the assets of this country, and that will be of use not only in our day but for generations yet to come. Our enemies even list among the items of the deficit they so loudly bewail and so extravagantly advertise the money advanced to individuals, firms, corporations, farmers, and home owners.

Every one of these loans—for they are only loans—is secured by valid assets. This money will all come back, and meanwhile the interest is being constantly added to the Government's resources. The various loan agencies of the Government are prosperous concerns. Their income today is larger than what they are putting out. Every one of them shows a favorable balance sheet.

The Government is in business; yes. And it is in profitable business. And it will remain in business only for as long as private enterprise fails to take it up. The Government would rather have the banks make the loans than make them itself. It is more eager to get out of business than the American Lobby League is anxious to have it get out of business. And it is getting out of business far more rapidly than the average person thinks.

This has not been a spendthrift administration. It has safeguarded its expenditures to such an extent that it is probable that there has been too much instead of too little red tape in the extending of relief. If you analyze the tenable charges against the Government distribution of aid to the destitute, they come down to the circumstance that some unworthy person got a few free groceries which he could have paid for, or that here and there men have not earned the meager pay permitted on relief projects—a pay left meager with the deliberate purpose of insuring that the Government should not compete with private enterprise and that no man should remain on the Government pay roll who could make a living by his own efforts. Undoubtedly in the expenditure of billions there has been some leakage, for it was deemed better that a few unworthy ones might get the doles rather than a helpless multitude should go hungry.

I have noted among the utterances of some who were desperately seeking for some method of assailing the administration a statement that the increase in the sales of commodities was due to the money disbursed by the Government. There is at least a basis of truth for this statement. A large part of the purpose of the disbursements was to prime the pump of business so as to get the wheels to moving again. And it has been wholly successful. The money that went for direct relief has been turned over a hundred times; in the purchase of food and clothing, in the payment of the wages of those who manufactured these things, in the capital that went into investment, and into the deposits of bank customers. These, thanks to the New Deal, are able to place their funds with the banks with perfect security that they are not going to be cheated out of them through the dishonesty or incompetence of those who a few years ago used these funds as their own in speculation, and when their speculations went wrong left their depositors to hold the bag.

The Government's Budget is out of balance. It was out of balance 2 years before the term of President Roosevelt began. By the time he came to the White House it was almost as much out of balance as it is now, with the difference that then nothing was being done to wipe out a deficit, while today every move is in that direction. The Government's income is steadily increasing. There is no justification for the fear of towering tax with which the constant effort is being made to scare the people.

This country has had huge deficits before now, and they have been cut down in the ordinary, orderly processes of government as prosperity returned and the Government's income increased. The same procedure and the same result may be looked for now.

As I said before, we are carrying our debt for less than it cost us prior to the advent of Roosevelt to the White House.

I have sketched hastily for you the actual situation and the situation as it is described by the professional and unprofessional purveyors of mendacity who, in their speeches and through the newspapers, are trying to convince this country that its Government is betraying them and that it is bound for the rocks unless another Hoover or a synthetic representative of the same type is put at the head of our Government.

The enemy has access to many newspapers which carry only the antiadministration side. Some of them do this because they are fundamentally Republican newspapers; some because they are owned or controlled by people or corporations of such wealth and magnitude that the effort to impose taxes in accordance with ability to pay is going to cost them something. The result is the same in either case. Many plaster their pages with any absurdity that a Republican spokesman, paid or unpaid, candidate or otherwise, is willing to father.

We Democrats have nothing at all to fear if we do our job and work earnestly, but it would be foolhardy to feel that we can lay down on that job and let the other fellows campaign uncontradicted and unhindered.

We have got not only to keep our own lines intact but it is our duty to see that those Republicans who in 1932 and 1934 put national welfare ahead of partisan spirit, remain true to their new allegiance. We owe these people a debt of gratitude. It was easy for any Democrat to vote for Franklin Roosevelt. It was not so easy for men and women reared in the Republican faith. I have acknowledged the greatness of the service of these before, and I am glad to admit the obligation now and here.

There is still another and, in some respects, an even more important group to which we must appeal. I refer to that great mass of good citizens with slight or no political affiliations.

These are the independents, who vote for whichever candidate they believe to be best for the country, for the policies that they believe will promote the public welfare. We had them all in 1932. I believe we have them all now, for men and women of this class look at and for results and are not likely to be influenced by such interested propaganda as is being poured forth to check the progress of the New Deal. Let me urge on everyone here to hold them close to us. We will always retain our own membership; we will gather to us many of the opposite political faith. But we need the independent voter. He is the individual who really decides elections.

We have had a great administration. We have nothing to apologize for; much less to be ashamed of. Our President and our Congress have saved the country. We have come through the hectic period of depression and reconstruction without great social disturbance, without violence, and with the great principles of the Democratic Party kept intact.

It is up to all of us to keep these great facts before the people, and so I call on you not only to perfect Democratic organizations everywhere but to keep a vigilant eye on the enemy, to nail every lie as fast as it is uttered, to point out the selfish purpose behind every hypocritical attack. That must be our work from now until next November. We must not be content with victory, but must work for a victory so overwhelming as to make it plain forever that democracy is the faith of our people and that loyalty to a great President cannot be broken down even by the flood of money that will be poured out to overwhelm us in the next 10 months.

Just remember as we go into the fight that Franklin D. Roosevelt is the hope of every man who suffers and the foe of every man who does wrong.

NAVAL STORES AND THE AGRICULTURAL PROGRAM

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to me by Mr. C. F. Speh, secretary of the Control Committee of the Marketing Agreement for Gum Turpentine and Gum Rosin Processors, of Jacksonville, Fla. It has to do with the recent decision of the Supreme Court on the Agricultural Adjustment Administration Act as affecting the turpentine and naval-stores industry.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CONTROL COMMITTEE OF THE MARKETING AGREEMENT
FOR GUM TURPENTINE AND GUM ROSIN PROCESSORS,
Jacksonville, Fla., January 9, 1936.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: The recent decision of the United States Supreme Court regarding the Agricultural Adjustment Administration has, of course, affected the turpentine industry. I am sure that even the relatively few who have opposed the program will admit that under the conditions facing the industry in 1933 that a restricted production was extremely helpful. This is equally true of the crop adjustment in 1935. Prices improved, whereby the producer was enabled to pay living wages to the hundreds of thousands working in the industry, the producer was able to greatly reduce his debt to the factor, and the timber owner to pay back taxes.

I am confident that other farm products have also benefited, and to such an extent that, even though a crop-adjustment program be considered as a temporary measure, it must be admitted that we are still far from having completed the task of bringing to the farmer the same purchasing power that the manufacturer receives for his goods. Therefore we believe that efforts will be made to pass the necessary legislation to continue farm relief in some form.

The purpose of this letter is to ask that you safeguard the interest of this important southern industry by seeing that naval stores, either as a commodity or as an industry, continue to receive benefits of any agricultural program.

Thanking you for everything you have done for the industry in the past, I remain,

Respectfully,

C. F. SPEH, Secretary.

JACKSON DAY ADDRESS BY MR. JUSTICE BUFORD

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excellent address delivered by Mr. Justice Buford at Madison, Fla., on Jackson Day, January 8, 1936.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and fellow citizens, we are gathered upon this occasion to celebrate the anniversary which should be cordially celebrated not only by those Americans who are affiliated with the Democratic Party but by all red-blooded, loyal Americans throughout the Nation.

We call this day Jackson Day because to the courage and genius embodied in that great soldier is due credit for the victory which came to American arms on the 8th of January 1815, 121 years ago.

Andrew Jackson was born in the backwoods country near the line between North Carolina and South Carolina. Whether he was born in the one State or the other is not definitely known. Each State claims his nativity. His birth occurred on the 8th day of March 1767, a short time after his father had died of injuries received in handling heavy logs. His parents had come to America the poorest of poor immigrants, hoping to carve out a fortune for themselves in the new land, but the husband and father was cut off in the prime of young manhood, and their hopes were blighted. Jackson's boyhood was that of the average boy in the country where he lived. He soon developed the vices rather than the virtues of the young men of that generation. Before he reached the age of 15 his mother died of yellow fever, which she contracted while nursing soldiers of the Revolution. Then Jackson became his own master. He was a reckless, carefree sort of fellow. Before he reached the age of 16 he had converted what little property his father had acquired into cash and spent it all in riotous living. He had become recognized as what we would call one of the fastest young men of his day. He appeared to find his chief pleasure in horse racing, cock fighting, drinking, and gambling; and yet with it all, by reason of his great courage, his high regard for justice, and his adherence to truth, he acquired and retained the respect and confidence of many of the most substantial people of his acquaintance.

While Jackson was no student, and never became one, he managed to get himself admitted to the bar and licensed to practice law in North Carolina before he was 21 years of age. About the time he reached his majority a great empire in the West which then bore the name of Franklin was being opened up. In 1788 the North Carolina Assembly created three counties included in those settlements along the Cumberland and established therein a superior court district. One John McNairy, who had studied law in the same office of Spruce Macay, where Jackson had studied, was appointed judge of that district. He happened to be one of Andrew Jackson's friends. At the time McNairy was appointed judge he was visiting friends in the Carolinas, and when he returned to the land of the Cumberland, which was then becoming known as the Tennessee region, there went with him a number of his old friends and acquaintances, among whom was Andrew Jackson. In 1789 Jackson was appointed solicitor in Judge McNairy's jurisdiction. In this position he was forceful and effective. The duties of his office required the exercise of physical courage and moral strength. Jackson was passionately devoted to justice. He was diligent and conscientious. It appears that he knew little about grammar and less about punctuation, but what he lacked in book knowledge was compensated for by other qualities possessed by him and which were so much needed in that position. By his fearlessness and fairness he won the confidence of the public, which he never lost. Time will not permit us to dwell on the many interesting events of his youthful career. In 1790 that area between the Ohio River and the north line of Alabama and Mississippi became the Southwestern Territory, and in 1791 the north half became the State of Kentucky. In 1793 the remainder of the territory set up a legislature, and 3 years later delegates met at Knoxville and prepared a frame of government looking toward admission to statehood. Jackson was a member of that convention, and it is a tradition that he proposed the name of Tennessee, which was an Indian name, meaning the Great Crooked River.

When Tennessee was admitted into the Union, Jackson was chosen its Representative in the lower branch of Congress. His career there was brief and uneventful. He served only about a year, when he was appointed to fill the unexpired term of William Blount in the Senate. In 1798 he resigned that post, but while in Philadelphia, then the Capital, he made the acquaintance of such men as John Adams, Jefferson, Randolph, Gallatin, Burr, and Edward Livingston. As a legislator, he was a misfit. The records show that he made only two speeches as a Member of the House and none at all in the Senate, though he did make quite a reputation for possessing a high temper. On his return to Tennessee he was appointed judge of the nisi prius court, which compares with our circuit courts, and, though the salary was only $600 per year, he retained that position for 6 years. In this position again his ignorance of law was compensated for by his common sense, impartiality, and courage.

In 1812 the Congress of the United States declared war against Great Britain. This was entirely to Jackson's liking; he had been impatient for it for years. There was but one thing which he seemed to wish more than to participate in a war with Great Britain and that was to invade the territories of Florida, drive out all foes, and extend the jurisdiction of the United States into the waters of the Gulf, and he insisted upon being allowed to undertake that job.

In December of 1814 a large fleet of British vessels appeared in the Gulf, just off New Orleans, with the purpose of taking the city of New Orleans, then the most important city of all the South, and using that as a base to recover possession of the United States and return its Government to the Crown of Great Britain. Jackson's defense of New Orleans is one of the thrilling stories of all times. He was not only required to meet and fight a foe superior in numbers of men trained and seasoned in warfare under generals of wide experience, armed with modern implements of war, but he was also confronted with all sorts of opposition, even within the city which he proposed to defend, and in the Legislature of Louisiana, which was then in session.

Many of the people of Louisiana resented their severence from France. They had not become reconciled to their position as a part of the United States. They were more than willing to surrender to the British with the hope that they would then be returned to the French or made an independent province. So Jackson had to fight the enemy within as well as the enemy without. He fought both with supreme courage; and when the final battle was won, though Jackson was not a religious man, he firmly believed that his success was due to the intervention of divine Providence and he publicly proclaimed that to be true. There is no reason for us to assume that Jackson's judgment in that regard was not well-founded. If the British had pushed the advantages which they obtained in the battle fought on December 28, 1814, undoubtedly they would have taken the city of New Orleans and with it they might have taken Jackson, but they faltered and delayed and lost. This delay gave Jackson opportunity to establish fortifications and breastworks, to bring his men into better position and to prepare for that which he now realized must be a stand for the life of the Nation. He did prepare and was ready to meet every onslaught made by the British until the night of January 7, 1815. During the days between the last of December and January 7 new troops, new officers, and new equipment had been brought from the British fleet, landed on American soil, and made ready for the charge with which they proposed to end the fight for possession of New Orleans. They intended to advance under cover of darkness and a heavy fog to a position, where when daylight came they would have the Americans under a withering fire, but it appeared that everything which could go wrong with the plans of a general went wrong with the British that night. Only one division of the whole British Army there appeared to be in position at the appointed time. All others were delayed by one cause or another until daylight came, the fog lifted, and they were in view of the enemy but still out of gun range, and found themselves facing an adversary fully prepared to meet their charge.

Despite these adverse happenings, however, the British determined to carry out their plans. For a short while it appeared that Providence was with the British; the fog settled down, so that neither line could be seen by the other. The British advanced, but when their columns were within 300 yards of the American trenches the fog lifted; the British were within range of the American guns and were mowed down like wheat before a reaper. Again and again they rallied and charged, to be met and mowed down by the steady fire of the Americans behind their cotton and mud breastworks. The American losses were seven killed and six wounded, while the British lost most of their officers and men.

In those days news traveled slowly. The record shows that the terms of peace had been agreed on and the war theoretically closed before the Battle of New Orleans began. Neither Jackson nor the British knew of this. Each was fighting to win a war which did not exist. After the battle of January 8, Jackson continued martial law in New Orleans under the theory that a state of war still existed, and he stood prepared to receive the British should they recoup their forces and return.

Jackson ordered the arrest of a citizen for violating martial law. A Federal judge issued a writ of habeas corpus, and thereupon Jackson ordered the arrest of the Federal judge and detained him in prison. Probably the greatest example of Jackson's spirit of compliance with constituted authority was when he was officially notified that the state of war no longer existed, and had ceased to exist before the battle, realizing that he was without authority to hold either the first offender or the Federal judge for violating the martial law, he discharged them. Thereupon the judge ordered Jackson before him to answer to a rule for contempt of court. Jackson divested himself of his uniform, humbly appeared before the judge in civilian clothing, and without protest paid a fine of $1,000 to purge himself of contempt of court. Thirty years later the Congress of the United States authorized the repayment of this fine to Jackson with interest since its payment by him.

Late in January 1815 Jackson returned to Tennessee. He still had in mind, however, the invasion of Florida and he did not let that rest, until early in 1818 he was authorized to proceed against the Creek and Seminole Indians.

As all of you know, Jackson finally with his army invaded Florida without any record authority from Washington. The history of his movements indicates that he was rather fearful that he would be stopped by orders from Washington before he could finish what he set out to do. Whether he really had the consent of authorities at Washington to pursue the course which he did pursue in Florida or not is a question which will never be definitely answered. It is certain that he wrote a letter proposing to do about what he did, and in that letter he stated that any sort of intimation from the President or Secretary of War that such course would be approved would be considered by him as a warrant to proceed. Jackson claimed to have received a letter so framed as to intimate that he should proceed.

There were but two forts of any consequence in Florida at that time, one being at St. Marks and the other at Pensacola. Jackson took St. Marks first. There he found an old Scottish trader by the name of Arbuthnot, who appeared to be in sympathy with the Indians, and who was engaged in trading to the Indians arms and ammunition, as well as other goods which they might require. Arbuthnot was arrested on a charge of furnishing ammunition to the enemy and of conspiring with the enemy against the United States. From St. Marks Jackson proceeded with some force of men to the Suwannee River near the present location of Old Town. There he captured a trading vessel with all its supplies and also captured Robert Ambrister. Ambrister was charged with leading Indians in warfare against the United States.

Perhaps the most potential trial ever held in the State of Florida was the trial of Ambrister and Arbuthnot at St. Marks. They were both British subjects. By Jackson's orders Arbuthnot, who was a civilian and more than 70 years of age, was hanged; while Ambrister, being a soldier, was shot. Jackson did not allow even the trial or the execution to delay his plans to move on to Pensacola. A few days after the execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister Pensacola was in the hands of Jackson and his troops.

Jackson left the Territory of Florida under the command of subordinate officers as civil and military Governor and hurried elsewhere.

The Spaniards demanded the return of the Florida Territory. The request was complied with. The Spaniards also demanded the summary punishment of Jackson, which request would probably also have been granted had it not been for the defense of Jackson by John Adams, who stood against all others high in authority in the Capital and defended Jackson to the last. Jackson's popularity with the people made it a dangerous business for any man who sought popular favor to attempt to punish Andrew Jackson.

In 1821 Jackson was appointed Governor of Florida. He did not want the post and got rid of it as soon as possible. In fact, he only took it to organize a government in Florida. He took over the government in Florida on July 17, and in November 1821 he was again back at the Hermitage, having resigned the office of Governor of Florida, and for the first time in 32 years was free of the responsibility of either civil or military office. May I interpolate here that two of the members of President Jackson's Cabinet became Governors of Florida. They were Branch and Eaton.

When Jackson returned from Florida he was 54 years of age and was broken in health by exposure, wounds, and disease. He received all his wounds in personal combat. He thought he was settling down for life to enjoy only the few days which might be left to him in quiet and peace with his wife, his son, and an adopted son, but his days of quietude were not to last. He was soon to be called as a candidate for the Presidency of the United States. He was nominated by a convention in Harrisburg, Pa., in March 1824. The result of the election, however, was Adams' election. Jackson was again put forward as a candidate in 1828 and was elected in that year President of the United States. The campaign of 1828 was a bitter one. The opposition not only persecuted Jackson, but it also defiled the name of his wife and probably hastened her death, which occurred at the very hour when the people of Nashville and all Tennessee had gathered to partake of a farewell banquet in honor of the President-elect.

The difference between the democracy of Jefferson and the democracy of Jackson was that Jackson was not only an advocate of decentralized government and State rights, of which Jefferson had been the great leader, but he was amongst the first to advocate and strongly contend for the right of the voice of all the people in the Government. He not only stood for State rights but he stood for the rights of individuals as against the special interests. A writer has stated succinctly that Jackson's conception of the fundamental principles of our democracy was:

"Sovereignty, under our form of government, resides in the people of the United States. The exercise of the powers of sovereignty is entrusted by the people partly to the National Government and partly to the State governments. This division of functions is made in the Federal Constitution. If differences arise, as they must, as to the precise nature of the division, the decision rests, not with the State legislatures, as Hayne had said, but with the Federal courts, which were established in part for that very purpose. No State has a right to 'nullify' a Federal law; if one State has this right, all must have it; and the result can only be conflicts that would plunge the Government into chaos and the people ultimately into war. If the Constitution is not what the people want, they can amend it; but as long as it stands, the Constitution and all lawful government under it must be obeyed."

By many it was thought that State legislatures had the power to annul the application of acts of Congress within the dissatisfied State. In South Carolina there was much support of this idea. Frederick Austin Ogg, in his The Reign of Andrew Jackson, in speaking of Jackson's attitude toward nullification acts, says:

"And to a South Carolina Congressman who was setting off on a trip home he said, 'Tell them (the nullifiers) from me that they can talk and write resolutions and print threats to their hearts' content. But if one drop of blood be shed there in defiance of the laws of the United States I will hang the first man of them I can get my hands on to the first tree I can find.'

"When Hayne heard of this threat he expressed in Benton's hearing a doubt as to whether the President would really hang anybody. 'I tell you, Hayne,' the Missourian replied, 'when Jackson begins to talk about hanging they can begin to look for the ropes.'"

In this fight for the rights of the people, he made the abolishing of the Bank of the United States his chief objective. His thought was that to allow the money power of the Nation to be controlled by anything except the Nation itself was undemocratic and would defeat free government. No more determined fight was ever waged between conflicting interests than that waged between Jackson and the proponents of the Bank of the United States. The bank had a limited charter. Its period of existence under its charter granted by Congress was about to expire, and Jackson determined that the charter should not be renewed. He won the fight but not without making many enemies and bringing down much condemnation on his own head.

To Jackson may be attributed the inauguration and continuation of the governmental policies requiring the election of many officers by direct vote of the people, amongst the more important of which is that following this principle of Jackson's democracy we have in Florida and many other States today the election of justice of the supreme court by direct voting of the people.

There are many parallels which may be drawn between the conditions which existed at the beginning of and during the Jackson administration as President of the United States and the conditions which have prevailed in this country during the past few years.

The Bank of the United States opened its doors at Philadelphia in 1817 with branches from Portsmouth to New Orleans. In 1828, when Jackson was elected President, there was bitter feeling throughout the country against the bank and its branches. The bank was to the people of that day the personification of big business. The people, as a mass, appeared to believe that it had the power, intent, and purpose to crush all individuals who had not its favor; that by participation in politics it could and would control the destinies not only of the States but also of individual citizens; that it could and would weaken the power of the States and strengthen and centralize the power of the National Government; that it could and would build up or pull down political parties or men as and when its interests would be thereby served without regard to what the result might be to the masses of population of the Nation.

Jackson thought the best way to destroy such an influence was to withhold its authority for existence. Therefore he opposed the granting by Congress of a renewal of the bank's charter. During his first term as President the Congress, after a bitter fight, passed an act extending the charter. Jackson vetoed the act. The veto became the paramount issue in the campaign of 1832. The issue made was whether the people should rule or should submit to being shackled and ruled by a monopolistic money power controlled by some Americans and many foreigners residing in other lands. It was a hard and bitter fight; but when the presidential electors met, Jackson had 219 electoral votes and his opponent, Henry Clay, had 49.

Orators and statesmen of that day pictured the money power in politics as a hideous octopus reaching out to crush and destroy the sovereign will of the masses and to control and grow fat on the earnings and misfortunes of the people. Jackson was the master painter of the picture.

On the other hand, Webster, Clay, Calhoun, and other strong men fought to perpetuate the bank and to retain its power unabated, with warnings that the bank held the lifeblood of the Nation and that to destroy the bank would throttle the life of the Nation. In the end the bank, with its power, went out of existence, and when Jackson left the Executive chair the Nation was out of debt and in control of its own money-issuing machinery. But the fight to control this country through the control of the power of money and wealth has never ceased. The charges and countercharges punctuating the campaign of 1832 could be heard throughout the land with but little variation in 1932, and we shall hear them again in 1936. Then the Democratic leader who fought for what he conceived to be the rights of the masses of American people was Andrew Jackson. Today the Democratic leader who fights in the foreground for many of those ideals for which Jackson stood is Franklin D. Roosevelt.

It appears to me that here, in the beginning of 1936, our country fast approaches a crisis, and the most serious one it has faced since that one which culminated in 1861. To me it appears certain that one result will be a change in our Constitution. Do not let us be persuaded to believe that when we have found the provisions of the Constitution inadequate to allow Congress to enact legislation designed to effectuate a parity between those who earn by the sweat of the brow, who till the fields and wield the spade, the pick, the hammer, the saw, and other tools, and those who earn by the power of the dollar there will be no insistent demand by a majority of the people of these United States for a change in those provisions.

Within a short while I think the question will be not, Shall our Constitution be amended? but How shall our Constitution be amended? Shall it be by broadening and extending the powers of Congress over subject matters to be dealt with and leave standing the safeguards which now obtain, or shall it be by withdrawing the power of the judiciary to determine and adjudicate the validity of, or invalidity of, legislative acts, leaving it to the legislative branch of the Government to legislate as it sees fit and to be its own judge of the extent of its power? God forbid that the latter course be chosen.

There is no sacrilege in proposing to amend the Constitution. Its framers intended that it should be amended, and it has been amended 21 times already. But its amendment should be with caution and careful consideration.

I have been unable to think of a single right guaranteed by the Constitution to the people in mass, or to a citizen, which has not been sought to be divested or abridged by legislative enactment which would have resulted in the destruction of that right had it not been for the timely intervention of the judiciary when properly invoked. The judiciary has not the power, and has never assumed the power, to veto legislative enactments. The province of the judiciary is to take the legislative act which may be attacked and measure it by the yardstick of the Constitution. If the legislative act was not adopted in the manner provided by the Constitution, then it never became a law; or if it was adopted by the manner provided by the Constitution but contains provisions that violate the organic law, then it is an act against and in derogation of the supreme law adopted by the sovereignty, the people of the Commonwealth, and must fall.

In the last analysis it is not the judicial branch of the Government which determines what may or may not be provided in a legislative act, but the people expressing themselves through the supreme law, the Constitution, have predetermined some of the things which the legislative branch of the Government may not do and the manner in which it may and must do certain things. The judiciary only points out the inconsistency, if any exists, between the supreme law and the attempted subordinate law and thereupon adjudicates the validity or invalidity of the legislative act.

If the power of the judiciary is broken down by legislative enactment, by constitutional amendment, by general disregard of its judgments, or by its own unsound and unwarranted judgments and decrees, revolution will follow as surely as night follows the day.

Extend the power of Congress within wise limitations if such be necessary for the public good, but forever retain the power to confine its actions within the limitations which at the time are prescribed by the Constitution, and democracy will survive, otherwise it will perish.

THE FARM PROGRAM

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech delivered at Chicago, Ill., on December 9, 1935, by Edward A. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, before the seventeenth annual convention of the federation, December 9, 1935, on the subject of "The farm problem."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

This is a supreme moment for America. I predict its spirit will be written into the pages of history. To the millions of our citizens in all walks of life, who are with us today in soul and flesh, we bring a practical ideal and philosophy for mankind. The challenge of this meeting, for America, is unity and cooperation. Its echo is world-wide.

The President of the United States has just engraved this challenge upon our hearts and minds. We embrace it eagerly, not in the spirit of battle but in the spirit of the two greatest leavening forces of earth, unity and cooperation. These are the levers that are lifting America into the dawn of a new day. They are the hope of a world under which the volcanoes of destruction again are rumbling and seething.

We meet today to safeguard a new civilization. Its emblem is economic justice, not alone for agriculture but for all mankind. In this great crusade agriculture joyfully takes the responsibility of leadership. For agriculture is peace loving and cooperative. Its very philosophy, its mode of life, its conception of service, are all symbolic of peaceful pursuit, peaceful occupation, and peaceful attainment.

This is an epochal meeting. It is an hour of drama. Here is gathered the united army of agricultural leadership. Seated on this platform are the men and women who are shaping the destinies not only of rural America but of the Nation and of the world. For no man lives unto himself. Nor does any group, class, or nation.

These leaders are consecrating their lives to a conception of a new civilization. They preach unity, cooperation, social justice, economic freedom. They pattern their teaching after the greatest teacher of them all. Like His teaching, their work is always for the good of others. It touches the very roots of life. It symbolizes service in every sense of the word. It extends far beyond the material mind of man. It reaches into his soul.

A NEW CIVILIZATION

Truly, this is a supreme moment. This Nation faces a crisis. What we do now affects the welfare of generations to come. In our decisions are involved the life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness for the people of this Nation and of the world. From time immemorial conditions have arisen in every nation affecting the lives and destinies of its people. American history points vividly to such crises. The Declaration of Independence gave us political freedom. The Constitution gave us religious freedom.

Today America faces a decision on which the economic freedom of the great masses of its people is predicated. No more momentous crisis has been faced by America since the founding of our country 159 years ago. Our economic life is at stake. Our future hangs in the balance. We have been approaching this crisis for a long time. Some have been blind to it. Others have laughed it away with a shrug of the shoulder.

The crisis of today cannot be met with the slurs of ridicule. It cannot be met with meaningless and empty phrases and slogans. It cannot be cast aside as something inconsequential. It is not a fleeting and temporary hysteria. It is not the aftermath of a passing emergency. This crisis is deep-rooted. It extends into the very bowels of our Nation. It runs as deep as life itself. It involves the life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness for all of the people of this Nation. This crisis must be met by the same patriotism as founded this Nation.

THREE CROSSROADS

America stands today at the crossroads of three paths. One path leads into the realm of an incomparable civilization. The other two paths will plunge mankind into the dark ages of conflict and destruction. Which road shall we take? What shall be our decision? What shall guide us in making that decision? Let us survey all three paths. Let us see for ourselves where they end.

All modes of life are governed by man-made systems. Under the rules and regulations made for us, call them what you will, we live and work. These regulations may be laws, the result of habit. Or they may be habits, the result of laws. It matters not. Whatever their origin, they are man-made. They are not the work of a supreme being. If they were, we would have no cause for meeting today. So long as we are governed by man-made conditions we can shape them to our will.

The economic system which has given the world the emoluments of a twentieth century is centuries old. It is synonymous with greatest progress. Its dominant ideal is invested in the sacred and inherent desire of human beings to have, to own, to possess, and to serve. Nothing should be done to eliminate this desire. But much must be done to compel this system to serve all mankind equitably if it is to survive. Human beings are more precious than systems. They are the ones who must be served. We must stop thinking in terms of man-made values. We must think in terms of souls and bodies. We must save souls and bodies from exploitation.

AGRICULTURE'S WARNING

Inherently, agriculture is dedicated to the economic system we call capitalism so long as that system provides opportunity for economic equality. Agriculture stands for ownership and possession by individuals. Land is the primary tool of all production. Agriculture does not subscribe to any economic system which takes from it the individual ownership of that which it prizes and values most highly—property rights. But agriculture believes with all of its strength and spirit that if the economic system upon which this Nation was founded has become warped and outmoded it must be modified and reshaped. So long as this system is man-made, agriculture says it can be modified and reshaped. Agriculture insists that capitalism shall be rebuilt once more around the ideal of economic equality and economic justice.

At the crossroads of these three paths organized agriculture posts three signs. It asks the Nation to read and commit them to memory. One signpost bears this inscription: "Agriculture is capitalism's greatest safeguard and protection against those forces on the left which would destroy capitalism merely for the sake of substituting ideals that are contrary to human nature. Beware of taking this road." The second signpost bears this inscription: "Agriculture is capitalism's greatest bulwark of defense and security against those forces on the right which would destroy capitalism by making it the master instead of the servant of the people. Beware of taking this road."

These two paths are as wide apart as the poles. Yet they lead into the same economic jungle. One enters the realm of chaos from the left. The other enters it from the right. Between these two paths is a third. This is the economic road on which agriculture has traveled from the day this country was founded. The signpost on this road bears this inscription in the immortal words of Thomas Jefferson: "I trust the good sense of our country will see that its greatest prosperity depends on a due balance between agriculture, manufacture, and commerce." This is the road for America to follow.

TRUE ECONOMIC DEMOCRACY

This agricultural path was surveyed and built by our forefathers. Agriculture then was the dominant industry. Finance and commerce were its handmaids, not its masters. This is the path which modern agriculture insists must be kept open so the Nation can travel upon it to permanent economic stability and prosperity for all groups and classes. Years of neglect have made this road almost impassable. But it can be rebuilt. It must be rebuilt. The weeds underfoot must be cut down. The overhanging branches must be pruned back. The chuckholes must be filled in. The parasitical toll bridges across this road must be completely eliminated. Too much toll already has been collected.

Jefferson's immortal words epitomize the philosophy of organized agriculture. Through its platform the American Farm Bureau Federation seeks to rededicate the ideals of the founders of this Nation. It seeks the perpetuation of the economic system under which the Nation may attain its highest degree of spiritual and material values. By recourse to legislative action under the privileges and opportunities of the Constitution it seeks the restoration of the true economic democracy of our forefathers. That is the democracy of George Washington. It is the democracy of Thomas Jefferson. Abraham Lincoln dedicated his life to its cause. Theodore Roosevelt championed it. Woodrow Wilson idealized it. By breathing life into it Franklin Roosevelt has endowed it with practical reality.

SANCTITY OF FARM HOME

What is this program? What is its ideal? What is its focal point? The answers to these questions converge into one picture—the saving of farm homes. The maintenance of a true economic democracy is centered in the sanctity of the farm homes of the Nation. That was the ideal and conception of our forefathers. The mad rush of a mechanized civilization substituted greed for service; acquisition for cooperation; competition for devotion. It unleashed the dogs of industrial war. It set in motion the forces of self-destruction. Man became a mere pawn on the chessboard of corporate greed. He wandered off into no man's land of prejudice, greed, hatred, fear. He forgot the Kingdom of Heaven. What price civilization!

Individuality was destroyed. Economic freedom vanished. Economic opportunity was meshed into the time-clock punching, regimented whirl of the industrial Juggernaut. Economic equality and social justice were brushed aside in the mad rush, in the mad struggle for ruthless, competitive gain. Like an armored tank, this industrial machine rode roughshod over humanity, conquering human souls, destroying human bodies.

When the depression finally came upon us this frenzied philosophy, in the armor of a gigantic machine, had destroyed our courage, had conquered our morale, had blinded our sight, had almost destroyed our vision. In the midst of plenty it had scattered starvation. In the midst of abundance it had created want. In the midst of joy it had caused sorrow and grief. It produced untold privation, suffering, humiliation. It rocked modern society with the sullen fury of an earthquake. It was caught in its own path of destruction. It closed the doors of factories. It turned naked millions into the streets. It filled box cars with the youth of the Nation. It caused crime to increase. Only Mother Earth and her unfathomable resources escaped the destructive fury of the depression. Mother Earth, who sustains all!

ECONOMIC EQUALITY

Shall this philosophy, which has even failed its masters, be permitted to mold again the lives and destinies of peoples and nations? Or shall we supplant it with a new conception of the purpose of man on earth? In the true spirit of cooperation, American agriculture asks for economic equality and social justice as the new American pattern of life, not only for herself but for all groups and classes. Because of her contributions to mankind and civilization, American agriculture has the right to leadership in this crisis. The pages of history reveal that agriculture earned that right long ago by always playing a patriotically sacrificial part in meeting economic crises.

During the World War the responsibility placed upon American agriculture to produce food to win the war was not a mere gesture. It was a genuine responsibility, upon which the salvation of world democracy depended. Fundamentally opposed to war, agriculture responded with all of her resources. If the philosophy of agriculture, expressed in terms of economic equality and social justice, were the philosophy of other economic groups, there might not have been a World War. The chaotic condition of peoples and nations during the years that followed might have been averted.

The years lapsed. Then came the period of economic readjustment. Again American agriculture displayed her patriotism. She decreased her production because it was in the interest of public welfare to eliminate the huge unsalable surpluses of food and fiber which depressed American farm life to starvation levels. In both instances what agriculture did was not motivated by selfish desire, but by a sense of altruism, in which her own interests would be enhanced, not first but last.

There could be no national prosperity so long as economic inequality prevailed for one-third of the total population. Agriculture has produced and will continue to produce food and fiber to sustain life, but she demands a fair return for her services. The proof of agriculture's recent economic contributions is all around you. You cannot escape it. You see it everywhere. In the metropolitan centers, in the open country, in the industrial districts, on the farms, on the country road, on the highway, in the stores, in the banks.

NATION'S DEBT TO AGRICULTURE

Agriculture broke the back of the depression. Attribute the causes for the beginning of economic recovery where you will. It matters not. It was agriculture that stimulated return of purchasing power. It was agriculture that caused the economic spiral to uncoil its springs. To agriculture the Nation again is indebted. Consumers, industrialists, merchants, labor, farmers—all economic groups began to share in recovery when agriculture began to buy. Disagree if you will as to what caused agriculture to start buying. That does not matter. But you cannot put aside the indisputable fact that economic prosperity and economic stability spring from the soil.

The man on the land creates the basic new wealth of this Nation. Depressions may wipe out cities. They may raze to the ground the industrial works of man. They may starve out humanity. They may strip man of his worldly possessions. But they cannot touch the soil. They cannot dam up that fountain from which all wealth springs eternal.

American organized agriculture, under the leadership of the American Farm Bureau Federation, marches down the road to which the hand of Jefferson points. It asks all America to follow. Through its platform the American Farm Bureau Federation seeks to rededicate the ideals of the founders of this Nation. Aloft, so all men can see, the army of the green and gold carries the banner of economic equality into the legislative halls of the Nation. With the aid of a courageous Congress and the help of a President of the United States whose humanitarian interests are unparalleled in the annals of our country, the platform of the American Farm Bureau Federation is written into law. Not all of it, but most of it.

MAN-MADE POLICIES

The man-made policies of the past give way to the man-made policies of the present. The seed of agricultural parity begins to come out of the ground. Parasitical weeds surround it. They seek to crowd out the new plant. They suck away its nourishment. They try to stifle it and keep the sun from it. But the new plant grows. The American Farm Bureau Federation fertilizes it. The army of the green and gold cuts down the weeds. It digs them out of the earth. The new plant flourishes. Other weeds come up. Those cut down grow up again. The more obnoxious and useless weeds are the tougher they are. But the agricultural army does not lose hope. It has faith in the seed it has planted. The faith of farmers is like the Rock of Gibraltar. Nothing can shake it. Not even winds, dust, storms, or floods. The army of green and gold plies its hoes. It cultivates the land once more. The plant of agricultural parity matures. And suddenly it blooms its century-old flower. There is rejoicing throughout the land.

If agriculture was dominated by greed, if its hands were not clean and free of avarice, if it were not actuated by service to the rest of mankind, it would not have the courage to lead in the cause for economic equality. But agriculture knows its cause is a just one. For agriculture has served mankind from the beginning of history. Until the end of history agriculture will continue to serve mankind. It was Theodore Roosevelt who said: "Men and women on the farm stand for what is fundamentally best and most needed in our American lives." Who would fail to subscribe to that statement?

Modern economic society is made up of three large groups. Between these three groups—agriculture, labor, and industry—is divided the national income of the country. The proportion in which that national income is divided by groups determines the degree of welfare enjoyed by the country as a whole. When that proportion is unbalanced, distress occurs. The greater the lack of balance in the distribution of national income the larger the economic distress. Most peculiarly, economic distress comes not only to those whose income is too small but to those whose income is too large. The result is a depression.

NEED FOR BALANCE

The only antidote for depressions is economic equality and social justice. Under the man-made policies of the past these fundamentals were swept away. Industry was permitted to flourish. Agriculture was allowed to decay. Industry and finance were exalted. Agriculture was scorned. Empire upon empire arose in industry and finance. Welding these industrial and financial empires were a series of capitalistic rivets consisting of mergers, interlocking directorates, and interlocking directors. A bewildering hierarchy of holding companies was created. They pyramided on each other, like the leaning Tower of Pisa. The roof was a superimposed financial controlling structure. In this tower was hidden the wealth, resources, business, and power of the Nation. The key to this tower was held by a handful of persons.

This tower was the home of an economic oligarchy controlling more than 80 percent of the total business of the country. In it lived the barons of finance and industry. They issued orders to helpless millions. From its turrets 36 barons, each with an annual income of more than $5,000,000 dollars, looked down upon 36,000,000 vassals, each trying to support an average family of five on an annual income of less than $1,200. Farther and farther reached out the barons to sweep more and more wealth into their tower.

The tower began to sway. The vassals summoned all their strength and resources. They put their broad backs against the tower and tried in vain to hold it up. Sweat poured down their faces. Their arms and legs ached. Their hearts and minds were numb. The tower is falling, they cried. The tower is falling. Run for your lives. We can hold it up no longer. It fell. Down it came, this tower of industry and finance, this stronghold of twentieth century barons. And the crash reverberated around the earth.

MAN MUST WORK

Out of the aftermath of this crash was resurrected an ancient truism. Its philosophy is simple. Its premise is as fundamental as life itself. It was carved into eternity by the Creator of all. It is this: Human beings are not machines. They cannot be mechanized like pig iron or lumber. Human beings were put on this earth by the Supreme Being to work and to create. Any man-made economic system which denies humanity the opportunity of work and creation does not enter into the realm of civilization.

For 17 long years the American Farm Bureau Federation had warned the country that the tower would fall. But its warnings fell on deaf ears. Patiently, meticulously, the Farm Bureau had explained its program of economic salvation to the political and industrial powers of the country. Its explanations fell on deaf ears. Not until 1933, with the advent of the present administration, did the first ray of light break through the agricultural gloom. More has been accomplished for American agriculture during the past 3 years, because an administration has built its national policies on the program of organized agriculture, than during any other comparable period.

Since 1919 the American Farm Bureau Federation has fought the battles of agriculture. It has welded the farmers of the Nation into a constructive, militant organization. It has dedicated itself to the principle of economic equality. It has molded public opinion. It has pled for unity and cooperation. Step by step it has initiated programs to improve every phase of American farm life.

FARM BUREAU'S SERVICE

It has demonstrated the paramount importance of the educational service to the farmers of the Nation by the land-grant agricultural colleges. It is responsible for the broad expansion of county-agent and home-demonstration work and for its place in the replanning of our national economy. The federation has given national impetus to the great place of cooperative endeavor in farm life and farm living. It has visualized what could be done with cooperative enterprises when properly projected and directed. It has taught the value of coordinating and correlating all cooperative services of a commercial character within the protecting shelter of the parent organization, the State farm bureau.

It had brought home to American agriculture the great need for unity in organization, unity in purpose, unity in action, as illustrated graphically in the creation of the National Agricultural Conference. It has demonstrated time and again the irreparable harm that comes from sectionalism and division. It has shown the need for a unified agriculture, an agriculture with a national viewpoint, standing as one man for the greatest good for the greatest number. All this and more your federation had accomplished in the face of terrific opposition, ridicule, abuse, misrepresentation, and even persecution. But it succeeded. Today your federation is credited with the initiation and development of the program which has brought new vision, a new outlook, a new hope, a new spirit, a new confidence, and a new optimism not only to agriculture but to the entire Nation. The agricultural policy established by your federation now is the dominant policy of the Nation.

UNITY AND COOPERATION

Throughout the entire program upon which the American Farm Bureau Federation is built, and much of which it has translated into realities, runs this theme of economic equality, unity, and cooperation. It permeates the whole philosophy of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It is the underlying theory of the whole philosophy of rural credit. It underlies the conception of the commodity or "honest dollar." It is the background for the beginnings in reciprocal trade treaties and tariffs. It underlies every equitable solution of the problem of taxation. The entire Public Works program is conceived in the spirit of economic equality and social justice. It is the foundation for the relationship between consumer equities and farm parities, which must be brought closer and closer until the distance between them is reduced to a minimum. It governs the relationship between exports and imports. It is the common meeting ground for processing taxes and protective tariffs. It was the basis for the equalization fee and export debenture measures, forerunners of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

It is the governing motive back of our great program of conservation of all our natural resources. It is the primary motive behind our great program to bring city and country closer through adequate systems of country roads. It is the impelling motive on which our national rural electrification program is based, through which a more attractive and satisfactory farm life will be created. This theme of equality permeates every effort by your federation to shorten the distance between producers and consumers of farm products, to the mutual advantage of both groups in reducing living costs. This is one of the equivalents in equality in distribution of income.

The contrast between the national policies of yesterday and today is as wide as the difference between day and night. Some of our leaders do not realize the changing times. The farm people do. Overnight, as it were, we have launched the greatest volunteer cooperative movement in modern history. Its genesis is a planned agriculture, a rebuilding of civilization. In it are involved our farms, our streams, our forests, our natural resources. It is a conservation program of a magnitude beyond the dreams of the past. It will earn us the tribute of future generations.

Organized agriculture has saved the day for the Nation. For its reward it asks no special privileges. But it insists that its policies shall be substituted permanently now for the policies which created the depression. Agriculture insists that the Nation's future policies shall no longer jeopardize the rights of citizens. The American Farm Bureau Federation, speaking for agriculture, demands the continuation of all mechanisms which will guarantee economic equality and social justice.

WHAT AGRICULTURE DEMANDS

To restore the purchasing power of the masses we demand the elimination of monopolies. We demand the abandonment of tariff subsidies for especially favored groups. We demand that subsidizing of various industrial and financial groups shall cease. We demand that the power given to the Nation's bankers to contract or expand the volume of money and credit and to lower or raise the value of money shall be rescinded. We demand the elimination of the colossal power of pyramided monopoly to regiment mankind. We demand the regulation of all corporations in the public interest. We ask industry, for its own good, as well as in the interest of public welfare, to accelerate its output at lower price levels so as to absorb unemployment. We demand the installation of a permanent program of social security to remove forever the hazards of life beyond the control of the individual.

If such policies bring us a finer and greater civilization; if their execution saves capitalism; if their adoption brings happiness, contentment, and satisfaction to humanity, the American Farm Bureau Federation is proud of having initiated them. No single project can complete the picture. No one group, acting alone, can attain the goal of the abundant life for all. Unity of action by agriculture, industry, labor, and finance is needed to complete the picture of a new day. Agriculture points the way. It challenges labor and industry to come with it. A program of selfish group imperialism can only lead to destruction. A program of cooperative group action will lead to national enhancement.

MOST GLORIOUS TASK

What a glorious task it is to rebuild and remake a Nation. What greater work can be conceived? Many can destroy. Few can build. In this task, to which you and I have dedicated ourselves, we are far above partisan levels, far above political levels. Political partisanship has no place in our ideals. No political party, no political program, no political candidate can turn thumbs down on our program, on your program, of economic equality and social justice.

The new philosophy of the future has more to do with human souls than with cattle and hogs. It deals more with human rights and human welfare than with crops, mortgages, and interest. It concerns itself more with human beings than with barns, milkhouses, farm machinery, bank buildings, factories, and the wheels of industry. Once upon a time the entire destiniy of American output in industry and agriculture was wrapped up in a spirit of competitive rugged individualism. One farmer's advantages were built upon his neighbor's disadvantages. The ability of a worker to get a job was measured by the number of men who were not successful. One farmer's happiness was built upon the distress of other farmers. Where one business man succeeded hundreds failed.

That day is gone, never to return. In its place has come a different philosophy, a different conception of life and living. Rugged individualism on an empty stomach or an unclothed back is a thing of the past. The rugged individualism which strangled agriculture, industry, and labor is gone forever. In its place has come a new type of cooperation, a cooperation based on economic equality or parity between economic groups. In the building of this cooperation organized agriculture has shown the way. Methods and machinery change from time to time. Principles go on forever. The principle of cooperation will never die.

IN HIS FOOTSTEPS

With those who do not join us in this new conception of a better life, we must be patient and tolerant, but as firm as tempered steel and as unyielding as the sands of time. There are still many who do not believe in our program, but their number is becoming less each day. Some do not believe because they do not wish to believe. Some are opposed for selfish reasons. Some are against us because they do not understand. But we are teachers. It is our job to explain kindly, to teach persuasively, to convert knowingly. Those are the methods of the greatest Teacher of them all.

God give us all strength to complete the great task we have started. We still have much to do before our program is securely built into the new home in which civilization is to live. Rome was not built in a day. The fallacies of years cannot be overthrown in the twinkling of an eye. But the goal to be achieved is so inspiring; the end to be attained is so worth while; the purpose to be accomplished is so significant that no man, no woman, can refrain from contributing to this task.

OUR HANDS ARE CLEAN

To this great work the green and gold army of the American Farm Bureau Federation is dedicated. Its weapons are not those of soldiers but those of educators and organizers. Its tactics are not those of destruction but of conservation. Its weapons are ballots not bullets. Its emblem is the plowshare and the pruning hook, not the sword and the spear. Its ideals are those of service, not of conquest. Its ranks are filled with men and women who fight for righteous causes, not for selfish ones. Its motto is the Golden Rule, not the black flag of piracy. Its molding influence will live long after the grasping purposes of military conquerors have been forgotten. The hands and conscience of the army of the American Farm Bureau Federation are clean. Its cause is right and just. In the words of our Master, "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." To this cause and into its brotherhood and affiliated sisterhood the American Farm Bureau Federation invites every American farm family.

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY OF WAR DERN AT INAUGURATION OF PHILIPPINE GOVERNMENT

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present for publication in the RECORD the address delivered by Hon. George H. Dern, Secretary of War, on the occasion of the inauguration of the new Philippine government, at Manila, P. I., November 15, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Citizens of the Philippines, I have the distinguished honor to come to you as the representative of the President of the United States to participate in the ceremonies of this momentous occasion. We are about to establish and put into operation the government of the Commonwealth of the Philippines, as ordained by the Congress of the United States. This event is another landmark in your steady progress toward the fulfillment of your aspirations to be a completely independent sovereign nation—ultimately to be realized through the practical, cooperative efforts of two peoples imbued with the same ideals of liberty and self-government.

President Roosevelt asked me to say that his heart is with you on this historic day. A radiogram just received from him asks me to give you the following message:

"Please convey to President Quezon and the Filipino people on the occasion of the birth of the Commonwealth of the Philippines my sincere congratulations on this great forward step in the establishment of popular self-government, and express to them my confidence in their ability to carry out successfully the final steps in the accomplishment of their complete independence.

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

Thirty-seven years ago, through the fortunes of war, the Philippine Islands came under the flag of the United States. It was no premeditated aggression, and there was no thought of territorial aggrandizement.

Even before American occupation the Filipino people had started their struggle for freedom, with which Americans instinctively sympathized. What, then, was to be the attitude of the United States toward a dependency which it had so accidentally acquired? A policy of colonial expansion and exploitation was a departure from our national ideals, and therefore did not commend itself to the American people.

Our decision was soon made. Less than 2 years after American occupation, President McKinley's letter of instructions to the first Philippine Commission laid down these basic principles:

"In all the forms of government and administrative provisions which they are authorized to prescribe, the Commission should bear in mind that the government which they are establishing is designed, not for our satisfaction or for the expression of our theoretical views but for the happiness, peace, and prosperity of the people of the Philippine Islands * * *."

Later he declared:

"It is our purpose to establish in the Philippines a government suitable to the wants and conditions of the inhabitants and to prepare them for self-government and to give them self-government when they are ready for it, and as rapidly as they are ready for it."

That promise was made in good faith. In order that it might be creditably carried out it implied a period of training and preparation. Greedy exploitation was repugnant to our minds. We declared that the good of the dependency—not our own good—must be the first consideration—a new idea, perhaps, in colonial administration. We harked back to the spirit of 1776, and we conceded that the Filipinos had the same rights as we claimed when we were colonists of Great Britain. The question is sometimes asked: "Why does the United States give up so valuable a territorial possession as the Philippine Islands?" The answer is that the value of the islands to the United States does not enter into the calculation. We have proceeded in accordance with the American conception of the fundamental right of peoples to govern themselves.

Having declared this unprecedented colonial policy, there arose the practical question of how and when it should be carried out. Through no fault of their own, the people of the Philippines had not been trained in the difficult art of self-government, and had never been given an opportunity to demonstrate their capacity to rule themselves. We had no means of knowing whether they had been disciplined, as Anglo-Saxons had been disciplined for centuries, to abide by the expressed will of the majority, however obnoxious that will might be to the minority. Stable popular government is impossible without majority rule.

Moreover, it was difficult for us to comprehend how popular government could be successful without popular education, which we Americans regard as the keystone of the arch of democracy. And so one of the first things we did was to send school teachers over here in large numbers, to establish a progressive educational system. And today universal education is the Philippine ideal as it is the American ideal.

Popular government was begun promptly and developed steadily. The election of municipal and provincial officials was the first step, soon to be followed by an elective lower house of the legislature and somewhat later by a completely elective legislature. And now we are taking the last step.

I need not trace the history of independence legislation. The Tydings-McDuffie Act, passed in 1934 and accepted by the Philippine Legislature, is the result of an earnest effort on the part of the Congress to meet the aims and aspirations of the Filipino people, so far as was consistent with harmonizing the various interests affected thereby. Its enactment is an expression of confidence by the Congress of the United States in the capacity of the Filipino people to carry out successfully the next and final steps in the program for the establishment of an independent Filipino nation.

The prescribed transition period of 10 years before complete independence becomes an accomplished fact seemed advisable and prudent in order to launch the Philippine Republic under the most favorable auspices. It provides adequate safeguards for the interests of both the American and the Filipino people. The problems that must be worked out in this period are vital and must be given the most careful and thorough consideration.

President Roosevelt, in his message to the Congress on March 2, 1934, said:

"* * * May I emphasize that while we desire to grant complete independence at the earliest proper moment, to effect this result without allowing sufficient time for necessary political and economic adjustments would be a definite injustice to the people of the Philippine Islands themselves little short of a denial of independence itself * * *."

The Independence Act is a broad grant to the Filipino people of local government. The enlarged powers granted under this act reside essentially in the people. The Commonwealth government is being organized in accordance with the provisions of your own Constitution, which goes into effect today, and which was formulated and drafted by delegates of your own selection. It is an enlightened, democratic document, and does great credit to the Filipino people. It contains a bill of rights expressing what the American people believe to be the basic principles of free government. Perhaps the greatest heritage that the United States has bequeathed to you is the bill of rights included in both the first and second organic acts of the Congress and carried over into your constitution.

You are about to witness the inauguration of the chief executive whom you have elected by popular vote; and all the agencies of local government will soon be functioning under the provisions of your constitution. Your president and vice president, the members of your supreme court, and the other island officials heretofore appointed by the President of the United States, will take office under the provisions of your own constitution and the laws of your own national assembly. Thus your local affairs pass to your own control, and you have the full responsibility of citizens of the Philippines, upon whose shoulders rests the mantle of government.

I may be pardoned an expression of pride and pleasure in the privilege of witnessing an event resulting from the cooperative efforts of two peoples situated on opposite sides of the globe, but laboring together to establish ultimately a new member of the family of independent nations. There is something unique and inspiring in the spectacle of two peoples voluntarily agreeing to dissolve the bands which unite them, and to go their separate ways; and yet that is the event to which we now eagerly look forward as the final consummation of the program for Philippine independence.

It is a source of satisfaction to the American people to know that the fiscal affairs of your Government are at this time, perhaps, at the best level in its history. Your finances are in excellent condition. Income for the past year exceeded expenditures. There is but a small public debt. Your governmental structure is supported by a prosperous and increasing commerce and by a thriving industry, backed by agricultural, mineral, and forest resources adequate for the maintenance of a high standard of living for all the people.

During my present visit I have been astonished by the fertility of your soil, the diversity and abundance of your crops, the wealth of your mines, the vastness of your forests, the excellence of your harbors, and, greater than all of these, the industry and virtue of your people. With such resources and with good government you should succeed.

With the present change in your government the office of Governor General is abolished. This exalted office has been filled by a long line of distinguished Americans, beginning with that illustrious statesman, William H. Taft, and ending with the able, efficient, and warm-hearted man who has served you during the past 2½ years, the Honorable Frank Murphy. In the discharge of his duties Governor General Murphy has made a record of which his fellow citizens at home are justly proud, and I know that you people of the Philippines honor and love him. I have no doubt that it is a great satisfaction to you that he now becomes the first United States High Commissioner to the Philippines and as such he will be the representative of American sovereignty and authority in your country.

While the American record in the Philippines is not ended, it is drawing to a close. As Secretary Root on one occasion said, "The country which exercises control over a colony is always itself on trial in the public opinion of mankind." We hope, of course, that the world will say of us that our work here has been well done. But especially we hope that you, the people of these islands, may continue to look with grateful appreciation upon the day that set this beautiful land under the sovereignty of the United States and to feel that our sojourn here has been a benediction to you. And I hope, too, that the people of the United States may forever feel a just pride and satisfaction in the monument thus built in your hearts. We shall continue to be united by the bands of comradeship and mutual good will.

I trust that the people of the United States will not forget to be grateful to the men and women who have reflected credit upon their native land by giving their talents, their energies, and their years to the service of their country and yours in this far-away territory.

I should be most unfair, people of the Philippines, if I did not point out that the main credit for the rapid evolution of your popular government is due to yourselves. You have been tried and not found wanting. You have had a passion for independence for many years, and with each new opportunity you have, in the most convincing manner, demonstrated your capacity to perform the varied and intricate tasks of government. In legislation you have shown vision, wisdom, fairness, and restraint, with a statesmanlike grasp of your problems. In administration the Governor General gives unstinted praise to his Filipino associates for their ability and integrity. In drafting your constitution you have shown a profound understanding of the fundamental principles of democracy, and you have produced a document remarkable for its impartial provisions in behalf of all the people. In the judiciary I wish to pay tribute to those distinguished Filipino jurists who, in cooperation with their American colleagues, have made your supreme court an everlasting credit to both the American and the Filipino people.

As Americans, therefore, we do not boast of what we have done here. Rather, we are gratified at having been given the rare privilege of cooperating with you in establishing a new democratic member of the family of nations in the western Pacific.

Mr. President, as generally affecting the affairs of the Filipino people, I feel that you have an exceptional opportunity to carry out the next steps of this vital program. The responsibility for the happiness and well-being of this people is entrusted to the new government under your leadership. President Roosevelt has faith in your devotion to democratic principles and in your ability and that of your colleagues to carry the program through in a manner well calculated to serve the interests of your people. I most cordially wish you every success in the administration of your high office.

And so, citizens of the Philippines, I congratulate you with all my heart upon the consummation of your desires. May your self-rule always be characterized by that enlightened justice which alone can make you a great nation. And may you always have reason to feel that the United States is interested in your welfare and is your true friend.

HISTORY AND DUTIES OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL'S OFFICE

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, the night of January 8, 1936, Col. O. R. McGuire, counsel for the Comptroller General of the United States, delivered an address before the Palaver Club, Washington, D. C., on the history and duties of that office. I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMPTROLLER GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES

The office of comptroller in governments is veiled in antiquity. It is said that in jurisprudence and the science of government, as in theology, all roads lead to ancient Rome. Polybius, the historian, writing some 100 years before the beginning of the Christian era, stated that the Roman Senate had first of all control of the public treasury and the power to regulate both the receipts and disbursements of public funds—a power which is generally exercised today by the legislative branches of all popular governments. Of course, the Roman Senate in those early days of world-wide domination could no more perform the vast amount of detailed work attending the receipts and disbursements of public funds than could the Congress of the United States today, when the functions of government in a great country have so largely increased, and so there existed in the Roman scheme of government an officer corresponding somewhat to the comptrollers in modern governmental systems.

In an address of October 9, 1935, before the Inquirendo Club, which is published in the November 1935 number of the Federal Bar Association Journal, I called attention to the long and bitter struggle between the Stuart Kings of England, on the one hand, and the House of Commons, on the other, with respect to the control over appropriated moneys. In substance, the Stuart Kings took the position that the function of the Parliament was to appropriate money for the use of their government, and that it was the responsibility of the King and his ministers to apply the money to any purpose they saw fit, regardless of the purposes stated in the appropriation acts. And for a long time the Kings of England were successful in their struggles with Parliament. Finally the House of Commons concluded that the ever-mounting burden of public debt, the waste, extravagance, and even fraud in the expenditure of public money were such that the King and his ministers could no longer be trusted to use the public money for the purposes stated in the appropriation acts without some check to see that they complied with the law, and in the so-called Subsidy Act of 1624 it was provided that the money therein appropriated should be in the custody of treasurers appointed by the Parliament, that the money should be expended by a council of war likewise so appointed, and that the accounts showing the expenditures should be examined and settled by a committee of the House of Commons or by its representatives appointed for that purpose.

In the proposed articles of government drawn up December 16, 1653, for the Cromwellian Commonwealth government, it was expressly provided that the yearly revenue should be paid into the public treasury and should be issued out for the uses as stated in the laws enacted by the legislative branch of the government. Out of the struggles of this period grew the accounting-control system of England, and it is not without interest to note that the Bill of Rights of 1689 specifically provided that it should be illegal for the Crown to expend public money in any other manner than authorized by Parliament.

Contemporaneously Englishmen were flocking to the shores of virgin America, driving the savage Indians to the hinterlands, establishing villages in America, and setting up forms of government to regulate their common affairs. In the Mayflower Compact of 1620, the Pilgrim Fathers agreed among themselves to render obedience to all just and equal laws enacted from time to time by them for the common good, with the result that during the course of more than 100 years we find that at the beginning of the Revolutionary War the Thirteen Colonies had severally established systems modeled closely on the English system of control in the legislative bodies over the safekeeping and expenditure of the public moneys.

These constitutional and statutory provisions adopted by the several Colonies have been collected by me in an article published in the January 1926 number of the Illinois Law Review. I cannot undertake to do more at this time than to state, generally, that it was settled in colonial America that no taxes could be levied or public moneys expended except pursuant to statute originating, in most instances, in the lower house of the respective legislative assemblies. Also, that these lower houses either had an auditor responsible to them to examine and audit the accounts of receipts and expenditure collected or made, as the case might be, by executive officers, or the work was performed by select committees appointed by the respective lower houses of the colonial governments.

With this background of history, it is easy to understand that the Congress, under the Articles of Confederation, found that patriotism is a cloak often worn by rascals and that the conclusion was reached to husband the meager resources of the Confederated Government by the establishment of an accounting system to examine and settle the accounts of the various disbursing officers of that government to see that the public money was expended in accordance with the ordinances, as the statutes of the Congress were then termed. This accounting system under the Articles of Confederation took final form in an ordinance of September 26, 1778, for the rearrangement of the Treasury, wherein it was provided that there should be a Comptroller, an Auditor, a Treasurer, and two Chambers of Accounts appointed by the Congress for a term of 1 year each.

The act of September 2, 1789 (1 Stat. 65), establishing the Treasury Department under the Constitution, provided—over the protest of James Madison, who was then a Member of Congress from Virginia—that the accounting officers of the United States should be bureau officials of the Treasury Department; that they should consist of a Comptroller, an Auditor, and a Treasurer, appointed from time to time by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; that the Auditor should receive and examine all accounts subject to review as a matter of course by the Comptroller; and that the Treasurer should not honor warrants against appropriated funds unless the warrants be countersigned by the Comptroller.

This accounting system functioned from 1789 to March 3, 1817, when it was amended by a statute of that date (3 Stat. 366) to provide for four auditors and for two comptrollers. Subsequently, by a statute of July 2, 1836 (3 Stat. 80), there was added a fifth auditor and later a sixth auditor. The act of March 3, 1817, required the work of review of the settlements made by the auditors to be performed by the comptrollers, the said work being divided more or less arbitrarily between them. By an act of March 3, 1849 (9 Stat. 395), there was created a third comptroller, designated as Commissioner of Customs.

This system existed from March 3, 1817, to July 31, 1894, but such a slow-footed accounting system was wholly inadequate to the growth of the country and was investigated by the so-called Dockery Commission, with the result that there emerged the act of July 31, 1894 (28 Stat. 208), as a rider on an appropriation act, reorganizing the accounting system. The Customs Service had been reorganized by an act of 1890 and the third comptroller, known as Commissioner of Customs, was made an administrative official in the Customs Service and so remains today. The offices of the First and Second Comptroller of the Treasury were abolished, and also the reviews by the comptrollers as a matter of course of the settlements made by the six auditors. There was established in lieu of the offices of First and Second Comptrollers the office of Comptroller, reverting in this respect to the system as established in the Ordinance of 1778, and the original Treasury Act of September 2, 1789, with this difference: that the Comptroller did not revise the settlements of the six auditors except upon request of the claimant, a disbursing officer, whose accounts were involved, or the head of the department or independent establishment concerned.

The Comptroller retained the jurisdiction and responsibility vested in the Comptrollers throughout our history to countersign warrants debiting appropriations and crediting the accounts of disbursing officers on the books of the Treasurer and for any other withdrawals of public moneys from the appropriations. The requisitions of the heads of departments and establishments for warrants were routed through the office of the appropriate auditor, there being one for each of the principal departments of the Government, and one for the State Department and for the miscellaneous esablishments, boards, and commissions. The auditor made a report to the Comptroller as to the state of the disbursing account, and if it was in fair shape the Comptroller countersigned the warrant after it had been signed by the Secretary of the Treasury, placing funds to the credit of the particular disbursing officer and against which he was, and is, required to render his accounts at stated intervals, generally once a month.

In addition to the duties theretofore imposed by law on the Comptrollers of the Treasury, there was expressly provided in the act of July 31, 1894, that the Comptrollers, on the request of the head of department concerned or any disbursing officer should render a decision—termed "advance decisions"—as to whether any proposed expenditure was authorized by an existing appropriation. This decision, when rendered, was required to be followed in the audit and settlement of accounts containing the expenditure, and the procedure was in recognition of the practice which had developed over the course of years for the heads of departments and their subordinates responsible for the expenditure of public moneys to inquire in advance of expenditure whether the appropriation act authorized such an expenditure to be made; that is, whether the Comptroller would cause the appropriate auditor to credit the expenditure in the accounts of the disbursing officer.

The reorganization in 1894 of the accounting system did not go far enough. President Taft's Commission of Economy and Emciency wrestled with the problem and finally recommended that the accounting system be made independent of all the spending agencies of the Government, including the Treasury Department, which had become one of the greatest of such spending agencies during the course of years, and very largely because that Department long has been famous for the economy, efficiency, and integrity with which it discharges any duty imposed upon it including the construction of public buildings, running a fleet of Coast Guard vessels, public health service, etc. This report also recommended that the offices of the six auditors and Comptroller be combined into one office, so as to bring about a greater degree of uniformity in the settlement and adjustment of claims and accounts. After a period of years the recommendation with modifications was approved in the Budget and Accounting Act of June 10, 1921 (42 Stat. 23, 27).

I have pointed out in my articles in the January 1935 number of the Georgetown Law Journal and in the November 1935 number of the Federal Bar Association Journal that under the Constitution the Congress has unlimited control over the appropriation of public money for any purpose of general welfare which may commend itself to the elected representatives of the people. It is for the Congress, upon the recommendation of the President or his administrative officers, or otherwise, to state in the permanent law or in the appropriation acts the purposes for which such appropriations may be used by the administrative and executive officials of the United States and the procedure which they shall follow in obligating these funds; as, for instance, the utmost publicity in advertising and contracting on behalf of the United States—a procedure which I outlined in an article in the Georgetown Law Journal of 1930. These purposes may be as broad as the Congress may see fit or may be as strictly defined and hedged about as may commend themselves to that august body. Whether the appropriation be broad or restricted, and whether such appropriations are exempted from or made under the general provisions of permanent law applicable to the obligation and expenditure of such funds, it is, in my judgment, the responsibility of the Comptroller General of the United States to see that the spending agencies observe the mandates of the law, whatever those mandates may be.

By this I mean to say that the Comptroller General of the United States is not an executive or administrative official of the United States. It is no part of the function of the Comptroller General to decide for executive and administrative officials whether they shall have one employee or a dozen, one automobile or many automobiles, or otherwise, in their uses of the appropriations made by the Congress, so long as these officials stay within the ambit of the congressional grant of appropriations and make the expenditures in accordance with the law. The question of policy; that is, the uses and the amount of public money which shall be appropriated for the many thousands of items of expenditure in the Federal Budget is a matter for the legislative branch of the Federal Government; and, as I have stated, the Congress may make this grant as restricted or unlimited as it may deem necessary or desirable.

However, since 1921 the Congress has authorized and directed the Comptroller General to submit to it either general or special reports from time to time as to any contracts entered into contrary to law and reports and recommendations as to needed statutes to secure greater efficiency or economy in the expenditure of public funds, and he is thus empowered to bring to the attention of the Congress any loopholes which may need plugging against waste, extravagance, or fraud in the expenditure of the public money. That is to say, if in daily and hourly contact with the enormous and far-flung expenditures of appropriated moneys, the Comptroller General may see that by an amendment of existing law or by the requirement of a different procedure in the obligating and expenditure of the money there may be obtained a greater measure of economy and efficiency, it is not only his privilege but it is his mandatory duty to bring the matter officially to the attention of the Congress or to the appropriate committee thereof with suggested legislation to effect the needed reform. Furthermore, the heads of the various administrative departments and establishments of the Government are almost without exception extremely jealous of the economy and efficiency with which there is conducted by subordinates the work of their particular departments and establishments. If some subordinate in Washington or in the four corners of the earth should fail to carry out the mandates of the Congress, it is generally sufficient to lay the matter before the head of the department or chief of establishment with the suggestion that there be corrected the erroneous or illegal procedure. In most instances such suggestions are promptly and vigorously adopted by the responsible administrative officials and made the rule for the future guidance of their subordinates.

The smooth and orderly operation of such procedure requires, of course, a great deal of tact and firmness with a sound knowledge of where accounting and control jurisdiction ends and administrative duties begin. The zone between them is a twilight one, and it is not to be overlooked, of course, that in theory—and, happily, largely in practice, especially in the older agencies of the Government with their trained personnel—the administrative officials are experts in their line, and it is a rare instance where they deliberately defy the will of the Congress as expressed in the law. In most instances where they do so the head of the department or establishment concerned will soon bring them to task if the matter is brought to his attention. My official experience leads me to the conclusion that the spending agencies are generally anxious to observe the requirements of the law in the expenditure of public moneys, but they sometimes have great administrative difficulty in finding out what are the requirements of the law and even more frequently in assembling the facts and presenting their problems so as to permit an accurate determination whether the particular proposed expenditure is within the terms of the appropriation sought to be charged and in accordance with the law. It would be a good thing if in this connection the principal fiscal officers of the departments and establishments could serve an apprenticeship of a few weeks each year as subordinates of the Comptroller General so that they could learn the work and be in a better position to advise their administrative superiors as to the routine procedure to be followed.

This is supposed to be a government of law. Of course, in a great administrative organization such as that of the United States Government, we sometimes run across administrative officials, generally subordinates, who think they know better than the Congress and the President what is best for the country, and that the appropriations should be expended in the discretion of such subordinates rather than in accordance with the restrictions and limitations and for the purposes stated in the statutes, or, for that matter, in regulations promulgated by the President and heads of departments for the guidance of their administrative subordinates. It is the primary function of the Comptroller General to see that such men and women are not successful in carrying out their will rather than the will stated by the legislative branch of the Government after long investigations, extended hearings, careful writing of the law, and with the composite knowledge of past practices which may have resulted in waste, extravagance, or, even worse, in the expenditure of public money, which is the aim of all right-thinking people to prevent at all hazards.

Aside from the examination of contracts and the auditing of accounts of disbursing officers, the office of the Comptroller General makes what are known as direct settlement of claims for and against the Government. These claims may arise for deficiencies in pay and allowances of persons working for the Government; they may arise under contracts where doubtful questions of law and fact are involved; or they may arise under special relief statutes. In all of such cases the function of the Comptroller General is to determine, first, whether the claim is one authorized to be paid from the appropriation, and, second, whether the claim is one in accordance with the general principles of law or specific statutes applicable thereto, or both. The settlement of such claims not only requires a thorough knowledge of the financial laws of the United States, prior decisions of the accounting officers, and applicable opinions of the courts, but a high order of judicial ability with an approach to the problem in particular cases absolutely devoid of prejudice. As I have above indicated, the Comptroller General, whoever he may be, is not, under our scheme of government, concerned with questions of policy in the making of appropriations, and it matters not whether he is in agreement with the purposes of particular appropriations or opposed to them; it is his duty to carry out the mandates of the Congress as expressed in the law. If administrative officials and claimants do not agree with the law as enacted by the Congress, they should take their complaints to the Congress, where they may be considered with a view to changing the law if that body should conclude that it is desirable to do so. After all, the legislative power of this Government—the Congress and the President—make the laws and may change them within, of course, the Constitution as it may exist from time to time. The Comptroller General may not amend either the Constitution or the law by interpreting them other than as they are written at the time he is required to interpret them in the discharge of his most responsible duty to the cause of "government of the people, by the people, and for the people."

SUPREME COURT A. A. A. DECISION—EDITORIALS BY VICTOR MURDOCK

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two quite interesting and instructive editorials written by an outstanding and distinguished editor of the State of Kansas, the Honorable Victor Murdock, who formerly was a Member of Congress, and who was also at one time a member of the Federal Trade Commission, and who is now editor in chief of the Wichita Daily Eagle, published at Wichita, Kans., in which the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States holding the Agricultural Adjustment Act unconstitutional is discussed. One of these editorials appeared in the Wichita Eagle on January 7, 1936, and is entitled "After A. A. A. What?" The other appeared in that publication on January 8, 1936, and is entitled "The Critical Contest."

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wichita (Kans.) Eagle, Jan. 7, 1936]

AFTER A. A. A. WHAT?

With yesterday's sweeping denial of the constitutionality of A. A. A. by a majority of the United States Supreme Court, the question of a substitute for A. A. A. becomes paramount, not only from a political angle but, what is more important, from the economic angle. The Court's negative included a reassertion of a State's sovereign right against Federal legislative invasion, denied the validity of the segregated processing tax, and barred the voluntary contract in its use as a measure of production control.

This cleans the slate for the presentation of an alternative plan which will come within the limitations now judicially defined anew.

That there is such alternative plan is a conviction which all serious-minded citizens will entertain in connection with their knowledge that agriculture, which is basic, fundamental, and paramount in the permanent well-being of this country, must be restored to an economic equity in this Republic. That equity was long left to chance and that plan did not work. It is an equity which must be effectuated. It is not going to happen just of itself.

Immediately the most common proposal for an alternative to A. A. A.—a change in the Constitution—will be to the fore. The chances are against successful resort to this method. There are political factors which make any modification of State sovereignty difficult and, if not impossible, then highly improbable. In any event it is slow.

Can a substitute for A. A. A., not merely for political purposes but for permanent economic restoration of agriculture, be found without slow constitutional change?

It has not been identified to date. But that does not mean it cannot be found and the most likely field for finding it now appears to be in the control within constitutional limits of export surpluses, with compensation to producers in remunerative prices domestically prevailing, and with increased compensation for production, and encouragement in the raising of those agricultural crops which this Nation now imports. The Nation has found tariff duties within the Constitution. It can find these other aids constitutional.

But wherever the country now turns to put agriculture economically back into the picture and whatever the substitute for A. A. A. is finally to be, the Nation has put its hand to the plow, and it cannot, either with justice or profit, turn back.

[From the Wichita (Kans.) Eagle, Jan. 8, 1936]

THE CRITICAL CONTEST

In the A. A. A. decision crisis, there is now one issue. It is fundamental, and not since this Republic was constitutionally created has any issue been more far-reaching. It involves the power of the Supreme Court over the prerogative of Congress to appropriate money. Can Congress now pay money to the farmers under A. A. A. contracts?

The Supreme Court A. A. A. decision says Congress cannot. Congress is now determined to do it. It will have not only the sympathy but probably the outright support of the President if Congress continues in that determination.

In this contest two recent highly important expressions should be known and kept in mind. The first expression was made by the President last Friday night. It is this: "The carrying out of the laws of the land as enacted by the Congress requires protection until final adjudication by the highest tribunal of the land. The Congress has the right and can find the means to protect its own prerogatives." The second expression was made by Justice Stone, in his dissenting opinion on A. A. A. It is this: "The present act (A. A. A.) is held invalid, not for any want of power in Congress to lay such a tax to defray public expenditures, but because the use to which its proceeds are put is disapproved. The removal of unwise laws from the statute book appeal lies not to the courts but to the ballot and to the processes of democratic government."

Has the prerogative of appropriation in Congress any actual protection against the power of the Supreme Court? Has the Supreme Court the right to stay the hand of Congress in distributing public funds because it does not approve the distribution?

The issue is here clear-cut. It will be made even more so by the determination of Congress to appropriate money to pay the farmers under existing contracts.

The matter is of more moment than the money involved—of vastly more moment. It goes to the fundamentals of this form of government. And as Congress, which has surrendered so many of its prerogatives, is likely to fight for this one, and the Supreme Court is not likely to recede, the contest can be epoch-making.

THE NATIONAL GRANGE LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio address on the National Grange Legislative Program, delivered December 21, 1935, at Washington, D. C., by Fred Brenckman, Washington representative of the National Grange.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the Sixty-ninth Annual Convention of the National Grange, held at Sacramento, Calif., last month, a clean-cut and constructive program for American agriculture was adopted. Thirty-five States were represented by voting delegates, and, as usual, there was a large attendance. The oldest of our general farm organizations, the Grange, is composed of farm men and women from all parts of the country. From its inception it has been nonpartisan and has devoted its energies to fostering the interests of rural life and promoting the cause of good government. During the short space allotted to me I shall endeavor to briefly summarize for you the attitude of the Grange regarding some of the more important questions of national concern that were acted upon at our convention.

We are in accord with the views expressed by Mr. George N. Peek, the first speaker on our program today, with reference to the tariff and reciprocity. One of the chief planks in the tariff platform of the Grange is that so long as the protective system prevails, we demand the American market for the American farmer in the case of all commodities which can be advantageously produced in any part of our country. We already have a domestic surplus of practically every agricultural commodity on which tariff concessions have been made to Canada. Foreign imports cannot fail to add to these surpluses and depress the domestic price level of these commodities.

OUR MOST-FAVORED-NATION POLICY

One of the most unfortunate features of the whole situation is that while we receive some concessions from one country—Canada, as Mr. Peek has already pointed out—under the most-favored-nation clause, which in years gone by was written into trade treaties into which we entered with all the leading nations of the world, we must give these nations the same concessions we gave Canada, although they make no concessions to us. Unless these treaties, containing the most-favored-nation clause, can be abrogated or rescinded, the Grange demands the repeal of the Reciprocal Tariff Act of 1934, under which the Canadian pact was made.

The Grange is well aware that agriculture has long suffered under the inequalities of our tariff system. These inequalities operate to bring about a high-price level for protected industrial commodities and a lower price level for agricultural commodities. Seventy-five years ago Abraham Lincoln said that this country could not continue to exist half free and half slave. We are just as firmly convinced that this Nation cannot endure in an economic sense with two price levels, one a high price level for industrial commodities and the other a low price level for agricultural commodities.

In an effort to correct this disparity, Congress 2½ years ago enacted the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The declared purpose of this legislation is to give the farmer price parity with industry on the pre-war basis of 1909–14. The Grange heartily endorses the idea that the farmer should have price parity, which everyone must agree is but a matter of simple justice. If the Supreme Court should find the legislation which has been enacted in this connection unconstitutional, then it will be necessary to take other steps for agricultural equality that cannot be attacked on constitutional grounds.

So long as the Agricultural Adjustment Act remains in force, the Grange advocates:

1. A larger measure of farmer control and less bureaucratic methods of administration.

2. Further cooperation among farmers themselves, both in production and distribution.

3. Greater consideration should be given to the family-sized farm, rather than to encourage agricultural production on a purely commercial basis.

4. Greater privileges and opportunity should be given the tenant farmer.

5. The consumer's interest must be given larger consideration, to the end that consumption may increase rather than decrease.

It is well understood that the program developed under the Agricultural Adjustment Act was designed to meet a pressing emergency. The formulation of a permanent plan, based on sound economics and attuned to the fundamental traditions of Americanism, is a task with which we are still confronted.

CONTROL OF MONOPOLY

Our convention went on record as being strongly in favor of the more stringent control of monopoly. It is self-evident that the blessings of political liberty cannot be fully enjoyed under a system which permits monopolies and monopolistic practices to rob the people of the fruits of their toil, reducing them to a state of economic vassalage.

To all practical intents and purposes, the Sherman antitrust law has been suspended during recent years. Under the N. R. A., fortunately invalidated by the Supreme Court, we actually created several hundred trusts and monopolies and commissioned them to prey upon the people.

We look with particular disfavor upon the attempts which are being made to fasten a transportation monopoly upon the people of the country. The motor carriers' bill, passed at the last session, was the first step in this direction. It is our purpose to fight the water carriers' bill, which is still pending.

We demand that the Sherman antitrust law be enforced, and that it be clarified and strengthened so as to enable us to cope with present-day conditions.

We approve of the program of the administration for the prevention of soil erosion. The most precious inheritance we have received from the distant past is the fertile soil. Students of the subject tell us that for every pound of plant food that is used in the production of crops, 20 pounds are being washed down into the sea, or blown away by the winds, as in the case of the great dust storms that devastated large areas of the Middle West during the past few years.

MEASURES FOR SOCIAL SECURITY

In keeping with its traditions for constructive reform the Grange reaffirmed its stand in favor of workable measures for social security and old-age pensions on a contributory basis. The Grange does not look with favor upon any plan that would discourage thrift and personal effort during the productive years of life. In his message to Congress on this subject last winter, President Roosevelt wisely said:

"It is overwhelmingly important to avoid any danger of permanently discrediting a sound and necessary policy of Federal legislation for economic security by attempting to apply it on too ambitious a scale before actual experience has provided guidance for the permanently safe direction of such efforts. The place of such a fundamental in our future civilization is too precious to be jeopardized now by extravagant action."

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that there can be no such thing as personal or individual security that is not based upon national security. Any plan that would wreck the United States Government would certainly reduce us all to bankruptcy individually.

GRANGE ATTITUDE TOWARD CONSTITUTION

While the Grange does not look upon the Constitution of the United States as sacred, in the sense that it should not be changed in its minor details, and after mature consideration, we are firmly convinced that the checks and balances contained in the Constitution as between the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government must be preserved. During the past 150 years the American people, under our present Constitution, have had a greater measure of liberty and prosperity than has ever before been enjoyed by any nation.

This explains why the convention of the National Grange expressed its abiding faith in the excellence and fundamental soundness of the basic law of the land. There are those who advocate that the Constitution should be amended in such a manner as to greatly expand the powers of the Federal Government in certain directions.

Recognizing the fact, however, that this could not be done without restricting in a corresponding degree the rights of States and of individuals, the Grange does not look with favor upon this proposal.

There are those also who would advocate that the Supreme Court should be deprived of the power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional. To raise this point would make it appear that the Court had abused its powers in this connection. How far this is from the truth may be gathered from the statement that from the foundation of the Government down to the present time, Congress enacted approximately 24,000 public laws. Of this number only 59 have been declared unconstitutional by the Court.

CONGRESS AND THE SUPREME COURT

If ours is to remain a government of laws and not of men, the right of the Supreme Court to set aside acts of Congress that clearly violate the provisions of the Constitution must be preserved. Otherwise, to what agency could we turn to prevent a temporary majority from making a "scrap of paper" of the Constitution and destroying the liberties of the people? Again, it is not fair for Congress to enact legislation which common sense tells us is unconstitutional, and then have anyone attempt to place the blame upon the Supreme Court when it performs its sworn duty in passing upon such mongrel measures.

"But", someone may say, "what check is there on the Supreme Court? Is our Government to be ruled by a judicial oligarchy?"

The answer to this question is that the very first article of the Constitution makes provision for the impeachment of those who violate the trust reposed in them, and justices of the Supreme Court are not immune under this clause.

It is almost needless to say that the National Grange would vigorously oppose any attempt to deprive our highest judicial tribunal of a right which it has so sparingly and prudently exercised.

DEDICATION OF WILLIAM JOEL STONE MEMORIAL—ADDRESS BY SENATOR CLARK

Mr. TRUMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD the address of my colleague [Mr. CLARK] at the dedication of the memorial to Hon. William Joel Stone, former Senator from Missouri, at Nevada, Mo., October 11, 1935.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The State of Missouri today somewhat tardily honors itself by honoring the memory of one of its greatest statesmen, one of its best beloved leaders, one of its best and bravest citizens, William Joel Stone, who served this Commonwealth with distinction and great ability as Representative in Congress and as Governor, and who as a Senator of the United States gallantly wrote his name among the immortals as a great American patriot by his efforts to keep this country out of war.

To my mind it is singularly appropriate that this memorial dedicated by his grateful fellow citizens to a great Missourian should be erected in Nevada. Here he came as a struggling young attorney. Here he first established himself. Here his shining talents and great force of character first won general public recognition. Here he was honored by his first public office, that of prosecuting attorney of Vernon County. Here he first evidenced those great gifts for organization and political leadership which to this day make him unique in Missouri history. From here by the favor of the citizens of this congressional district he went forth to take his place upon the stage of national affairs, which he occupied with ever-increasing importance from that day to the day of his death. From this town he later went forth to become the chief magistrate of the imperial State of Missouri. Here he was borne by his own desire and that of his family when loaded with age and honors he came back from Washington to sleep the long sleep in the soil of the adopted State which loved him so much and which he had served so honorably and so faithfully.

Senator Stone was one of that outstanding line of Missourians who were born in Kentucky. The influence of the "dark and bloody ground", as the Indians called Kentucky, upon the social and political life of Missouri from the days when Daniel Boone, dispossessed of his property in Kentucky, came to Missouri to establish a new home is an epic in itself. In our own time it was a circumstance worthy of note that Gov. David R. Francis, who preceded Senator Stone in the governorship, Senator Stone himself, and my father, his long-time friend and associate, were all born in adjoining counties in the same congressional district in Kentucky within a year or two of each other. I once heard Governor Francis, in presiding over a meeting at the Jefferson Memorial in St. Louis at which Senator Stone and my father were the principal speakers refer to that fact in his introductory remarks. When my father came to speak he said that it was entirely true that he and Senator Stone and Governor Francis had all been born in the same congressional district in Kentucky. And he added that he had no doubt whatever that in the years that the three of them had been occupying important positions in the public service in this State there had been many who had fervently wished that they had all three remained in the same congressional district in Kentucky.

Born in Madison County, Ky., Senator Stone came to Missouri as a youth and was a student and graduate of the University of Missouri. He early developed the capacity for making enduring friendships and the talent for leadership in public affairs which were to distinguish him so much in his later life.

After leaving the University of Missouri, for some unaccountable reason, he spent a year or two in Indiana, and then, with that common sense which so much became him, he returned to Missouri, which was to be the field of his great activities, and located at Nevada, in Vernon County.

I shall not take time on this occasion to recount his early struggles to establish a foothold here although, as one who loved him very deeply and very sincerely and who has indulged the hope that someday I might have the opportunity of writing a biography of him which would do justice to his memory, I have collected many reminiscences of those early trials. But there are men in this audience today who knew Senator Stone before I was born who know that story better than I possibly can.

In 1884, at the age of 36, he was sent to Congress from this district and entered upon that brilliant career of leadership which only terminated when he was brought back to be interred in the soil of his beloved State here in Nevada.

We look upon this splendid statue here today, an excellent likeness, graven by a skillful hand; but there are many present, old men who knew him in his youth, younger men like myself who were privileged to be his friends and followers in his later days, who know that the handiwork of no sculptor, however cunning, could fully express the Stone we knew. Like that other great son of Kentucky, Henry Clay, the vivacity of his expression, the infusion of his personality, the play of his emotions, which contributed so tremendously to his power in the court, on the stump or in the Senate, were things which could not be graven in marble or bronze. One had to see him in action to understand his power, but once seen the impression was never to be forgotten.

We who knew him and loved him will always remember his appearance and deportment more clearly than it can ever be expressed in words or in effigy, no matter how splendid. A man of kingly bearing, tall and spare as the thoroughbred horses of his native State but broad and strong for a long race; a person commanding and graceful; a face which gave play to his emotions; his eyes dark and lustrous, which were the reflection of his brave soul. He had that God-given quality of making men his friends and binding their souls to his with hooks stronger than those of steel. He was a leader of men.

He was one of the greatest Governors of Missouri. Perhaps no greater tribute could possibly be paid to his administration of that great office than to remark upon the fact that he was the only Governor of Missouri since the Civil War ever to be elected to any other office after the conclusion of his term as Governor. He retired from the governorship as the undisputed leader of his party's organization in the State. No one has ever questioned Senator Stone's preeminent talents as a political organizer and leader. My father, who had had some experience in such matters and was an acute observer, wrote him down in his own book of recollections as the greatest political general Missouri ever saw.

Today I wish to speak of him as the statesman he was rather than to emphasize those qualities of political management in which he was so adept. And yet, since politics, as we use the term is after all but the instrumentality of statesmanship, I think it not improper in paying tribute to his memory to briefly mention those attributes which contributed so largely to the political history of Missouri and of the United States.

Senator Stone possessed in the highest degree the qualifications for political leadership—the far-seeing sagacity, the penetrating judgment of men, the power to attract friends and bind them to him, the infinite patience necessary to harmonize differences between those who professing allegiance to the same principles and the same party might have allowed personal differences to jeopardize the common cause, the industry necessary for the performance of the multitudinous tasks of detail which go with the maintenance of a political organization or a successful organization of any sort.

From the time of his service in the House of Representatives in the late eighties he was recognized throughout the Nation as one of the greatest of the counselors and chieftains of his party. Twice he managed campaigns of fellow Missourians for the Presidency of the United States. Twice he stood in the forefront of the battle and gave unsparingly of his great talents and his great personal influence in the struggle to bring to Missouri the highest office in the world. Twice he saw his friend with the nomination of his party for that great office almost within his grasp and then saw it snatched away by the perfidy and treason of one man—the same in both instances. As the son of one of those men, I know that I say what my father would wish me to say—what he would say himself if he could be here to say it—when I voice the very deep appreciation and affection and gratitude which he felt and his wife and children will always feel to Senator Stone for the generous, invaluable, and unceasing support which he rendered in that great campaign. The friendship between them was never broken, and for years in prosperity or in adversity, through evil or through good report, they stood side by side for what they believed to be right.

Senator Stone was elected to the Senate of the United States in 1902 and immediately took front rank in that body. His wide experience as a Member of Congress, as Governor of Missouri, and as Democratic national committeeman, his vast acquaintanceship, his proven reputation for sagacity and leadership relieved him of the necessity of passing through that period of apprenticeship usually required of new Senators. And during the years of his service as a member of the minority in the Senate his stature and influence constantly increased. He could have been the titular as well as the actual leader of his party in the Senate had he so desired, but for reasons of his own declined the honor.

I shall not undertake today to describe in detail the record of his brilliant senatorial career. It is written in the legislative history of the country. As an effective legislator he has had few equals in the Congress.

And then came days to try men's souls, days when to cling to the dictates of sanity and patriotism, to resist the hysteria and the propaganda which was hurrying this Nation into the shambles of war was to incur ostracism and abuse and cries of treason from those who sought to profit by plunging this country into war echoed by the deluded many who mistook hysteria for patriotism and propaganda for reason.

By a long course of unconscionable conduct on the part of some of the leading nations of the world, set off by the act of a fanatic, the world was plunged into the bloody chaos of the greatest conflict in history.

We know now that from the outbreak of the war in Europe insidious and persistent efforts were made on the part of both groups of belligerents to involve us in the struggle. Both were guilty of violating the neutral rights which we asserted. In this country propaganda on both sides ran riot. International bankers engaged in floating loans in this country for one group of belligerents exerted all the vast resources of their powerful financial connections to bring this country to the support of their clients' interests. Munition makers able to sell their wares only to the same group by reason of its control of the seas spent millions for propaganda to stir our people to the same purpose. Men seemed to lose their reason in the common madness of the hour. An American Ambassador, than whom better men have been hung for treason, actively aided the government to which he was accredited in the violation of the rights being asserted by our Government to the free navigation of the seas. An unofficial ambassador, holding no office whatever under our Constitution, roamed around Europe promising to commit our Nation to war in certain contingencies. But in all that time a little group of men high in positions of responsibility stood boldly forth in opposition to the policy of embarking this country in the war. At the head of this group stood that great Missourian, William J. Stone.

I would on no account wish to appear to do or say anything unseemly on this solemn occasion, and it may seem to some that even the mention of those controversial questions may fall within that category. But I have waited for nearly 20 years for an opportunity to do such justice as I am able to the memory of a great man for the course he then pursued. To my mind any discussion of his public career would be inadequate which did not pay tribute to his manly and patriotic course in that great crisis of our Nation's fate and of his own career. In my view, it was then that he reached the heights of statesmanship.

As chairman of the great Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, as one of the chief constitutional advisers of the President, as the most powerful single legislative influence on matters involving our international relations, Senator Stone from the beginning resolutely set his face against the course of permitting this Nation to be dragged into war to protect the profits of a few individuals. His course from first to last was thoroughly consistent. He clearly saw that the course being pursued of allowing our citizens as a mass to put their financial eggs in the nest of one set of combatants must inevitably lead us into the war if the war lasted long enough to drag us in. He supported this view with all the eloquence and force of which he was master. In one historic conference, at which my father and the leaders of the House and Senate were also present, he bitterly protested a course which he thought was likely to involve us in a war about which we had no concern.

I think I violate no confidence after all these years when I say on the highest authority that he received assurances on which he believed that he could absolutely rely that his fears were groundless and that there were no commitments on the part of our Government which could lead us into war. He participated actively and potently in the historic campaign of 1916 waged on the issue: "He kept us out of war." Six months later we were engaged with all our energies in the "war to end war" and to "make the world safe for democracy." What hollow mockery those slogans seem today!

In the winter of 1917, during the short session of the then-existing Congress, President Wilson suddenly sent to Congress a demand for the authorization of a so-called policy of armed-ship neutrality, which, in effect, meant that we were to permit the arming of our merchant vessels and actually to go to war without declaring war.

It was then that Senator Stone rose to his greatest heights. He fulfilled in the highest degree the best traditions of that long line of Missouri statesmen from the time of Benton down who in times of stress have adhered to their own convictions of their own responsibilities under their own oaths of office, refusing either to be seduced by the smiles of official favor or to be intimidated by the threats of mobs. He was adamant in his opposition to a course which he wisely considered could only lead us into war. He temporarily gave up his great position as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee to bare his breast to the storm and stand as the leader of the "little group of willful men", as President Wilson denominated them, against the involvement of this country in war. The measure was defeated by the expiration of the Congress on the day of President Wilson's second inaugural.

Then a storm broke upon the head of that devoted few the like of which has seldom been seen in our history. Abuse of the scurviest sort was heaped upon them. Their motives were impugned, and those who were nearest and dearest to them were not spared the pangs of imputations of the lowest purposes for their high official acts. I know from intimate contact with Senator Stone and from daily conversations with him how deeply he felt the wounds which he realized were being inflicted upon his family and intimate friends by the storm of abuse which was whirling about his head. But he had done and was doing what he thought was right and what he believed to be his duty under his oath of office, and in him was no variation or shadow of turning.

It has always seemed to me the great paradox of the war madness which gripped us in 1917 that no considerable public comment was ever aroused by the public confession of President Wilson that he had been wrong on the armed-ship policy and that Stone, La Follette, Norris, and their associates had been right. With the failure of that measure in the Congress, the President obtained from the Attorney General a ruling to the effect that he did not need the sanction of legislation to put it into effect—and he proceeded to put it into effect without any act of Congress. Less than a month later he made a dramatic appearance to ask for a declaration of war. He tacitly admitted that the policy for which he had fought and for opposing which Senator Stone had been so viciously attacked had led to a ghastly condition, vastly more intolerable than war—which was precisely what the hard-beset little group which had opposed the measure had predicted. But in the general hysteria this admission was overlooked.

May I be pardoned for narrating a personal incident which has recurred to my mind thousands of times since the war. During the interval when the storm was at its height after the defeat of the armed-ships bill and before the declaration of war, I was in Senator Stone's office, as I was nearly every day during a period of several years. The question of this battle came up. I still cherish in my memory his expressions about it. I never loved or respected him so much as on that occasion—the last time in this life that I was privileged to have a long conversation with him. He made it perfectly plain to me that he was not insensible to the pain which the storm of abuse to which he was then being subjected would cause his family and friends, but that he had done what he believed to be right and had no apology to offer to any living human being for the course he had pursued. And then, walking across the room, he looked out the window and said: "Bennett, we are going to have a war. I am going to vote against it, but I am not foolish enough to think I can stop it. And it will be the worst thing that ever happened to this country. It is not the lives it will cost—although God knows that it is enough to break a man's heart to think of the flower of our youth being killed and maimed and blinded. Some of you won't come back, and some of you who do will wish they had not. And it is not the money it will cost, although your great-grandchildren, if you get back and have any, will not see the payment of that debt. The worst of it is that after we win the war—and we will win it because we are too big and powerful a nation not to win the struggle in the exhaustion of all the adversaries—after we win the war we will never have the same sort of country again we have always had." Across the years it seems to me that the voice of Senator Stone comes to me as though it were yesterday, the voice of prophecy which has been fulfilled.

Well, we had our war. We had our war with all the fanfare of trumpets, with all the blood and agony and misery and suffering. We had our war which left a debt which our great-grandchildren will not be able to pass off. The whole world has been passing through the fiery furnace of the aftermath of war. Brutal dictatorships are in the ascendant in nearly every land as a result of the war to make the world safe for democracy. Our own terrific economic depression is as completely a part of the war as the shells which were fired on the western front.

And across the years I still see the figure of that man looking out to the light, willing to sacrifice his own political life in a protest against these things coming into being.

He died as patriotically and as bravely for his country as any soldier who died in battle. We should cherish his memory.

Governor Park, on behalf of the Stone Memorial Commission, I present the monument of its honored citizen. I close as I began by saying that the State honors itself more than Senator Stone. His real memorial is in the hearts of the people for his great public services. For whether or not monuments of bronze and marble endure, William Joel Stone marches with the immortals.

TAXATION OF ESTATES

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask that an editorial containing a letter written by Mr. Robert P. Scripps to Mr. G. B. Parker, and published in the Washington Daily News of January 10, 1936, be printed in the RECORD. The views of Mr. Scripps so nearly coincide with my own that I am greatly impressed by his argument. I was one of the conspicuous minority that voted against the high taxes on estates. This amazed many of my constituents, who, correctly, had never identified me with the big interests. My reasoning then was logical, and it is today. Estates seldom have a high percentage of cash in hand, and, unfortunately, that is all the Government is willing to take, thus forcing liquidation. It is not economical to break up going concerns in an attempt to collect an unwise tax. I hold no brief for scions of rich families and am willing to tax them on their inheritances; but I am unwilling to close a shop, stop the wheels of an industrial plant, or place a building on the auction block so that the devisee may raise money to pay his tax. There are, indeed, countries in which it is, in my opinion, absolutely necessary actually to break up great estates because so many of those estates have ceased to be used for productive purposes. In the United States, owing to the extent of our land, estates in and of themselves have not become antisocial in their nature, and there is no real reason for their being broken up or liquidated; in fact, the reverse is true; it is better that they continue as going concerns in order to prevent a tendency toward economic stagnation. Mr. Scripps has offered the solution, and we may recover the tax without penalizing pay rolls and production.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of Jan. 10, 1936]

A TAX-CREDIT PLAN

With a half billion dollars already looming up in the Federal tax picture, as a result of the A. A. A. decision, further tax legislation at the present session of Congress seems likely. Should the bonus pass, another vast sum must be raised. Therefore, despite the reluctance of Congress to deal with taxation in a campaign year, the problem begins to appear inescapable.

In this connection, as well as in connection with the job of raising the maximum amount of money under tax laws already existent, we believe the following letter from Robert P. Scripps, to be pertinent; that it states a problem which, could it be solved, would result automatically in a much improved state of health in the Federal Treasury. The letter:

Mr. G. B. PARKER,
Editor in Chief, the Scripps-Howard Newspapers,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PARKER: The thesis of this letter is that, regardless of how we come out of the depression, or who is elected this year, Government debts and probable future and continuing responsibilities are such that continued high Federal taxes are inevitable, and that at this time profitable discussion must be, not of how much we pay, but of how we pay it, and what with.

The chief point I wish to make is that conceivably most of the drag on business, industry, and finance that the contemplation of high taxes produces would be eliminated should the Government itself provide a guaranteed credit medium, on a long-term basis, for the payment of a large part of the Federal tax bill.

As an experienced payer of income, estate, and inheritance taxes, as well as controlling stockholder of these newspapers, perhaps it is about time that I go on record as still believing in the principles of visible, graduated, and ability-to-pay taxation which these levies represent. As you know, I have been executor and trustee for two large estates, the beneficiary of these estates, and the receiver of income calling for upper-bracket income-tax payments.

Without underwriting all or any present Federal Government expenditures, I am not objecting here to any of them. This country has faced—perhaps is still facing—an economic emergency. It is at least doubtful if any administration could have done a better or more economical job under the circumstances than has the present one.

Still, I do know that there would not be any business at all in this country did we not maintain a strong and active Government, able to meet just such relief and reconstruction emergency as that referred to, and that I would rather pay as large a part as possible of my share of maintaining it through these out-in-the-open personal income and estate taxes than through any other form of taxes that I know of—especially concealed ones like sales taxes, tariffs, corporation taxes, and special ones like taxes on tobacco, liquor, gasoline, etc.

The purpose of taxation ought to be to produce necessary revenues without hindering, crippling, or killing off business—the goose that lays the egg. This is something that our present laws do not exactly do.

After the death of E. W. Scripps in 1926 there was a good market for bonds, so that the financing of the obligations of his estate presented no great difficulty. However, as was proved in 1930, that was largely a matter of chance, and chance has no place in sound business or financing.

The fact is that profits, as the Treasury Department counts them, are frequently "paper", although tax claims against them are "cash on demand."

Estates consist of stocks, bonds, real estate, livestock, notes, or other items which fluctuate widely with the market, often regardless of intrinsic values. Tax claims against these are also "cash on demand", sometimes when cash is hardest to get.

One result is that credit is disturbed. Mergers, liquidations, changes of control and management take place. A great element of uncertainty is introduced into the conduct of businesses, both large and small.

Effectiveness and continuity of management of the going businesses in the control of which they function really represent a principal asset of most large, and therefore heavily taxable estates, and any tax-forced management change strikes directly at this asset. But beyond this, in every such case, there will be policy and employment changes affecting perhaps hundreds of thousands of workers and their families, so making this question a social as well as a merely fiscal or economic one.

To guard against this chaos, especially with respect to estate and inheritance taxes, many business leaders carry excessive cash or liquid reserves, instead of employing this capital in the development of their businesses and the employment of workers. These men are forced to create large personal fortunes, which they do not need, by the very tax laws which some feel should be the instruments for the wider distribution of wealth.

Other men, when tax liabilities loom suddenly, go to their commercial or investment bankers for funds—which may or may not be readily available. The bankers assume a sort of tax-farming function; sometimes they also assume an unwarranted control over enterprises built up without their aid.

As witnessed during recent depression years, some estates, normally sound, are forced into bankruptcy by the sudden imposition of tax liabilities, so that there is nothing left for the Government to collect on.

With respect to income taxes, it is not unusual for normally profitable transactions to be delayed, or abandoned altogether, because of the taxes involved. In the latter case, of course, the Government gets nothing.

What I want to stress is that in all of these cases it is not generally the amount of the tax itself that is discouraging, that holds up action, and that harasses responsible management, but the difficulty of financing payment in cash, or of absorbing into an otherwise reasonable balance sheet a new large Government "cash on demand" obligation.

What I would like to see thoroughly explored in our editorial columns, and indeed in Congress and the administration, is the possibility of our Government doing its own banking, extending its own credit to solvent income- and estate-tax payers. This could be accomplished through acceptance by the Government of long-term notes or other paper, payable in annual installments in the 15- to 25-year period that sellers and buyers of bonds are used to, at interest rates approximating those on industrial bonds.

If such taxpayers are really solvent, or if profits really exist, the Government could not over a long period lose anything, while Government income would be stabilized.

As stated above, the direct benefit would be that a large part of the uncertainty and financial "fear" element would be taken out of our national business operation.

Also, having faith in the essential patriotism of the majority of American business, industrial, and financial leaders, I believe that there would certainly be less apprehension of or opposition to reasonable Government expenditures—even emergency expenditures—simply because they seem large at the moment.

Sincerely,

ROBERT P. SCRIPPS.

WORK OF BUREAU OF MINES

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, Pennsylvania is the foremost mining State in the Union, producing annually in normal years nearly a billion dollars' worth of minerals, and the United States leads all the nations of the world in wealth of mineral resources. Because of this fact, and because from early youth I have had a part in the uses and development of these resources, I have a real interest in the welfare of the great mineral industries, and especially in the health and safety of the million or more men who work in and around the mines.

At the last session of Congress I addressed you regarding the mining industry, and again today I wish to invite your attention to the pressing needs of that important industry and of those who serve it. In my previous address I appealed to you in behalf of the Bureau of Mines, one of the most efficient organizations in the Federal Government, and one which has been given relatively small appropriations for its work, so vital to the well-being of the Nation. I am glad to say that later on the Congress gave the Bureau of Mines some much-deserved support, although, in my opinion, much more was needed.

Mr. President, it is strange that so few of us realize the magnitude of the mineral industries; that we have such a faint idea of the vital importance of the hundred or more commercial minerals produced in the United States. Without the unceasing supply of tremendous amounts of these minerals, our great Nation would languish and dwindle to a puny, poverty-stricken state. Light, heat, and power would no longer be at our command. Transportation in all its forms would slacken and stop. Means of communication, such as the telephone, telegraph, and radio, would no longer function. The wheels of industry would cease to whir; our luxuries, comforts, and very necessities would vanish; our civilization perish and decay.

Minerals are not only produced in every State but they are produced in 2,024 of the 3,071 counties of the United States, and in the remaining 1,047 counties the manufacturing industry depends widely upon the mineral supply. The population of the counties in which mining is the principal industry totaled more than 40,000,000 in 1930.

While about 1,700,000 men find employment in the mining industries, at least 25,000,000 people are directly or indirectly dependent upon the extraction and processing of mineral products for their livelihood. In my State of Pennsylvania alone we have an army of some 400,000 miners.

Products of the mines and oil wells form about three-fourths of the tonnage and more than half of the revenue freight carried by the Nation's railroads. When you add the tremendous additional tonnage created from the outputs of smelters, refineries, lime, cement, and brick works, you begin to realize something of how much our vast transportation network depends upon minerals. An interesting thing right here is that in Pennsylvania the number of miles of track laid underground in the mines is greater than the mileage of railway tracks spread over the surface of the State.

Of the entire wealth of the United States, conservatively valued in 1932 at more than $163,000,000,000, between 60 and 70 percent had its origin in the mineral industries. Our average annual production of all minerals for 10 years before the depression was five and one-third billion dollars, and when these minerals are processed or fabricated into what every man, woman, and child in the United States must have, the value is multiplied several times.

Mr. President, here are just a few figures that literally take one's breath. Since the beginning of the nineteenth century our country has produced more than 1,000,000,000 ounces of gold, about 12,000,000,000 ounces of silver, 40,000,000,000 pounds of zinc, 100,000,000,000 pounds of copper, 136,000,000,000 pounds of lead. In the past 25 years, while the annual value of farm production increased 17 percent, the annual value of mineral production increased 77 percent. Truly, we live in the age of mineral utilization. And in the face of this situation, in which the Nation depends so absolutely on the production of the mines, the oil wells, and the quarries, we appropriate less funds for the work of the Bureau of Mines than we do for the study of insects and about the same as for narcotics or fish.

At a time when thousands of our citizens are being slain by speeding motor cars and other thousands are slaughtered as the result of various kinds of industrial accidents, the lifesaving activities of the Bureau of Mines offers a refreshing, a stimulating, an inspiring contrast. Mr. President, every year in the United States the hideous monster that we call "accident" disables nearly 10,000,000 people. If all this pain and anguish were concentrated in my own State of Pennsylvania, it would mean that every citizen in this, the second State in the Union, would be laid low. The Nation's annual accident toll concentrated in Pittsburgh would cripple for life half the people in that splendid metropolis or it would kill every person in the bustling city of Allentown.

Before the Bureau of Mines came into existence in 1910 all good Americans were horrified at the frequently occurring explosion disasters in our mines, and especially in our coal mines. An explosion occurred in the State of West Virginia in December 1907 which wiped out 361 lives at one quick stroke. Another explosion occurred in Pennsylvania 13 days later destroying 239 lives. In December 1909 the tragic mine fire at Cherry, Ill., killed 259 men. In fact, the main reason for the establishment of the Bureau of Mines was the public demand that the Federal Government do something to eliminate, or at least to reduce, these terrible disasters.

That the Bureau has done its work well in response to this demand is shown by the fact that in the 5-year period before the Bureau of Mines was established by Congress (1907 to 1911, inclusive) there were 82 major mine disasters with 2,662 fatalities in the production of about 2,355,000,000 tons of coal, while in the past 5 years (1930–34, inclusive) there were but 27 such disasters, fatalities being but 455, in the production of about 2,137,000,000 tons of coal. Thus the fatality rate per million tons of coal produced dropped more than 80 percent. In 1933 there was but 1 major coal-mine explosion disaster and it cost 7 lives; there was only 1 in 1934 with 17 deaths; and in 1935 there were only 2 with a total of 22 deaths.

Explosion disasters, lurid as they are, never have been responsible for more than 20 percent of our coal-mine fatalities, and, even without reference to the good work done in the prevention of explosion disasters, the Bureau of Mines has aided materially in attaining the approximately 50-per-cent reduction in fatal and nonfatal accidents in recent years. In the 5-year period, 1907–11, there were 13,806 fatal accidents in our coal mines, or an average of 2,761 annually, while during the past 5 years the total was 6,955, or 1,391 per year, a reduction of nearly 50 percent. The fatality rate per million tons of coal mined has been reduced by 45 percent. So it is evident that since the Bureau of Mines came into existence wonderful progress has been made in reducing accidents in our coal mines.

Mr. President, I shall take but a few minutes to mention certain methods developed by the Bureau in its highly successful campaign to make the miner's job a safer one. In many bituminous-coal mines there frequently occur accumulations of dangerous gases which, if ignited by sparks or flame, may cause an explosion that may spread to all parts of the mine and take a terrible toll of death and destruction. To lessen the danger of such disasters, the Bureau has developed a system of testing electric locomotives, coal-cutting machines, and other electrical equipment, and of approving as "explosion proof" only such types of machines as have passed these rigid safety tests. The "permissible" explosive, which produces only a short flame, has largely replaced the dangerous longer-flame black blasting powder. "Closed" electric lamps—or safety lamps in which the flame is surrounded by a fine wire gauze—are being used in increasing numbers.

Falls of mine roof cause half the accidental deaths in coal mines, picking the miners off singly or in groups of two or three, something like the sniper does in battle. Methods for lessening the danger from this cause have been devised by the Bureau.

Near Pittsburgh the Bureau of Mines owns an experimental mine, one of the most remarkable mines in the world, operated for the sole purpose of obtaining scientific facts to be used in making safer the lot of the coal miner. In this mine the Bureau has shown that accumulation of fine coal dust in mines may easily cause a terrible explosion; and it has shown further that a proper distribution of rock dust in the mine may prevent or limit such explosions. Just a few years ago an explosion that occurred in a large Illinois coal mine was limited by the use of rock dust to a small section, which undoubtedly saved the lives of some 1,200 miners then at work.

The Bureau of Mines, since its creation, has worked steadily at the training of the miner in first-aid methods, which may help him to save the life or limb of his fellow miner when accident befalls. The Bureau also trains the miner in mine rescue methods, showing him just how to explore a mine wrecked by fire or explosion with the least danger to himself and with the greatest assurance of rendering effective aid to his buddies trapped by the disaster. More than 900,000 miners have been trained effectively in first-aid and mine rescue methods and hundreds of lives have been saved as a direct result of this training. Soon there will be a legion of a million miners trained, not in the arts of war, but in the ways of mercy—men who are bent not on sending their fellow men to the hospital or the grave, but on helping them back to their wives and children in the little house on the hill. In peak years the Bureau trained more than 100,000 miners annually, but reductions in its funds have decreased the number trained annually to one-half.

Mr. President, in my former address I told you that in 1930 the Bureau had 11 mine rescue cars scattered through the various mining regions of the United States and Alaska, and reminded you that because of lack of funds only 2 of the 11 cars were in operation. I plead for an allotment of funds to restore to activity at least some of these cars. Later on the Senate agreed to give $27,000 to the Bureau for this work for the fiscal year 1935–36, but the item was stricken out in conference. In my opinion, this action was a mistake, as the mining industry needs these cars and needs them badly. Surely the United States can afford to spend $27,000 on an activity designed wholly for the protection of the lives and limbs of the men who work in our mines. My own State, which now has one of these cars doing wonderful work in the anthracite region, would like much to have at least two or three more engaged in spreading health and safety information in the bituminous mining regions, where upward of 100,000 men are engaged in the dangerous work of producing coal for the benefit of you and me and of the people who are our constituents.

The Bureau's safety recommendations are being adopted by an increasing number of mine operators, and as a result many coal mines, metal mines, and quarries are producing large tonnages of material and are working for long periods of time without fatal accidents and even without accidents causing any lost time.

It has been estimated that, if the fatality rates noted during the years immediately preceding the Bureau's establishment had continued to prevail since that time, the number of lives lost during the last 24 years as the result of coal-mine disasters would have been at least 24,300 greater than the record shows. This reveals an annual saving of about 1,000 lives. Reduction in the number of fatal accidents is credited with the annual saving of an additional 1,000 lives, while an annual average of 50,000 nonfatal accidents in coal mines alone have been very largely prevented by the Bureau's vigilance and teachings. Unfortunately, even now more than 1,000 coal miners are being killed annually, so that the struggle for safety cannot be allowed to slacken.

With the accident rate from all causes mounting ever upward, the miner, working underground and exposed to many forms of danger, is safer than ever before; and I am confident that if the safety field workers of the Bureau of Mines, the men who actually put over safety ideas to our miners in their homes and at their working places, were sufficiently increased, the accidents at the mines could be reduced another 50 percent or more within a very few years.

Certainly, Mr. President, in view of these facts, it is no time to be niggardly with the Bureau of Mines. Certainly none of us would care to be in the slightest degree responsible for the occurrence of even one coal-mine disaster. Let us then give serious thought to these matters when the time comes to consider the appropriation of the comparatively small increase in funds which is required to restore the Bureau's safety activities to the basis on which it was formerly able to do such effective work for the cause of humanity. The additional funds given for the Bureau's safety work last year helped some, but it left the Federal Government with a woefully inadequate force to forward the health and safety of the legions who daily risk their lives in producing the minerals without which we could not live.

Splendidly rewarded as have been its efforts in saving the lives and safeguarding the health of the miners, it is not alone in this humanitarian field that the Bureau of Mines has accomplished great good. The products of agriculture are harvested and consumed, and the next season's planting will usually produce another crop of practically the same value. This, however, is not the case with minerals. Our coal, our iron, our oil and gas, once taken from the earth, cannot be renewed. The mineral resources of this country have required long ages for their accumulation, and of these resources we have but the one supply. In its fundamental research on the conservation of these irreplaceable mineral resources the work of the Bureau of Mines has been of the utmost value to the Nation.

In past years, notably before the establishment of the Bureau, wastes of our bounteous stores of mineral wealth, greater than the mineral resources of any other nation, were literally shocking. At one time probably a third of the coal was left in the mine in such condition that it could not be recovered in the future. Millions of dollars' worth of that valuable fuel, natural gas, were turned loose into the atmosphere. There were wastes in the mining of the essential metals, gold, silver, copper, lead, and zinc, and further wastes in the treatment of these ores. The tailings from gold mines, the slags from copper smelters, and the dumps from mines and manufactories were often literal monuments of waste.

This unpleasant picture of mineral waste has, however, been wonderfully brightened. The Bureau of Mines would be the last to claim all of the credit for the stimulation of research which has created millions upon millions of new wealth from the mineral discards of the past. But the Bureau has been a focal point around which the forces of scientific study and research have rallied. Men working patiently with test tube and retort in the laboratories of our universities and our great industrial enterprises have cooperated with the Bureau, have exchanged information with the Bureau's scientific workers, and the net result has been of almost inconceivable value to the Nation.

In the case of metal mining, this work includes studies of processes of ore treatment, with a view to reducing costs and increasing the percentage of mineral which may be recovered. It is only through such new knowledge that many of our important metal-mining districts have been able to continue operations in these recent years of low prices. In the Mississippi Valley lead and zinc mines the development of certain processes, actively fostered by the Bureau, has resulted in the recovery of millions of dollars worth of metals which formerly were not recovered. Many mines which otherwise would have been too low grade to work have, through these improved processes, been enabled to continue operations. Large piles of tailing from previous milling operations have been re-treated, and values recovered which otherwise would have been lost. Thousands of men have thus been given employment.

In the Rocky Mountain States the development of the process of selective flotation has made possible the mining of millions of tons of complex ores containing lead, zinc, copper, iron, and so forth, in which the minerals are so closely interlocked that it had not been possible to separate them into commercial products by previously known methods. The life of some of the important western mining districts, in which a shortage of commercial ore was becoming apparent, has thus been indefinitely prolonged.

Mr. President, the United States has long led the world in the production of oil and natural gas. The newspaper reader, scanning accounts of the opening of prolific new oil and gas fields, may fancy that the supply of these precious fuels will last forever. But these vast stores from Nature's storehouse, which required millions of years for their accumulation, can be dissipated in a few years if proper conservation measures are not employed. In past years wastes running into millions of dollars annually have occurred. Present wastes of natural gas have been estimated at a million dollars daily. Rich oil fields have been flooded by encroaching water, and huge reserves almost impossible to recover have been trapped underground.

The Bureau of Mines has resumed with greater vigor its studies relating to the prevention of wastes in the production of petroleum and natural gas.

The Bureau of Mines has made studies of numerous technical problems in fields and plants that are of vital importance to oil operators and refiners with the aim to eliminate waste, promote economic methods of controlling production, and determine more efficient ways of manufacturing and utilizing petroleum and natural gas. The operator has been shown how to win his battle against encroaching underground waters. Methods have been developed to prevent heavy evaporation losses from oil tanks and costly leaks from pipe lines. Wastes in refining processes have been stopped. All of these measures are reflected in direct benefits to the driver of the little family "flivver" and to the householder who heats his home with oil fuel or natural gas.

The value of our annual production of nonmetallic minerals—asbestos, asphalt, cement, clay, feldspar, gypsum, lime, mica, phosphate rock, salt, sulphur, talc, and so on—reaches huge figures. These nonmetallic minerals are of great importance. They insulate and safeguard energy, line our furnaces, form our crucibles, encase our spark plugs, form the bulk of industrial and commercial structures, and surface our roads and streets. They now create more new wealth each year than the metals and only slightly less than coal or petroleum.

In this field the Bureau of Mines has rendered great assistance in the development of native materials, which in many cases have displaced minerals imported from foreign countries. A notable example is the development of an American potash industry. Until recently the American farmer depended on foreign monopolies for the potash needed to replenish the soil. As a result of a potash exploration program, conducted in New Mexico and Texas by the Bureau of Mines and the Geological Survey, huge reserves of potash-bearing salts were discovered and American potash is now being extensively mined and used.

Before the establishment of the Bureau of Mines little was known of the characteristics of the many different kinds of coal mined in more than 30 States. Guesswork, rather than sound scientific principle, figured largely in fuel-burning practice. Boilers were wasteful and coals specially adapted for certain uses were being used for entirely different purposes. Studies conducted by the Bureau of Mines fuel engineers have changed all this sort of thing. Thousands upon thousands of coals have been analyzed; they have been burned under boilers, coked, and briquetted; they have been tested for their gas-producing qualities. The Bureau has been a pioneer in the study of fuel combustion and the transmission of heat, and it has contributed greatly to a clearer knowledge of the combustion of coal and the designing of boiler furnaces. It is now possible to select the particular coal best adapted for any particular purpose, and this information has been of immeasurable benefit to the fuel consumer all the way from "dad" fretting with the little household furnace to the highly paid combustion engineer designing the great boiler plant generating thousands of horsepower.

Mr. President, business cannot function efficiently unless it keeps its books and knows the facts about its own doings. The Bureau collects and disseminates statistical data and studies the economics of production, distribution, conservation, and storage of the numerous essential minerals. Results of these studies are used widely by the mineral industries to keep in touch with market trends and to solve business problems.

The Bureau of Mines endeavors to bring the mineral buyer and seller together by distributing lists of possible buyers and sellers of merchantable minerals. It gives publicity to possible new uses for minerals and calls attention to inadequately utilized sources of minerals and to discoveries of any sort that promise to afford opportunity for larger or more profitable use of the Nation's natural resources.

Because of the seriousness of the national economic situation this phase of the Bureau's work has been reorganized and enlarged; it is now able to supply exhaustive figures and economic analyses, and it hopes to build up constructive suggestions that will help the several mineral industries in making their plans. It is realized that the rate of mineral output must be adjusted to the world's ability to consume, and the Bureau is building up a service that will give a world-wide picture of production and consumption capacity. A specialist has been stationed in Europe as a first step in studying what the mineral producers of the United States will have to expect from foreign competitors.

The Bureau of Mines, seriously crippled in the past by reduced appropriations, has been able in the present fiscal year, as the result of better recognition by Congress of its needs, to resume to some extent certain useful studies that had been suspended because of lack of funds. It has resumed studies designed to increase the safety of explosives used in mining. It is working on methods of making motor fuel from coal and lignite, looking forward to the time when, after the exhaustion of petroleum reserves, an oil-from-coal industry will be a national necessity. It is studying low-temperature coking of coal in the effort to find a solution for the smokeless-fuel problem and to find uses for byproduct oils and tars. It is conducting further studies to determine the characteristics of the different coals, whether they are suitable for making gas or coke, and what chemicals can be derived from them.

Vast hydroelectric power developments at Boulder Dam, Muscle Shoals, and other Federal projects emphasize the need for possible outlets for surplus power. The Bureau is studying the possibilities for employing this power in utilizing mineral deposits.

The Bureau of Mines has again taken up studies relating to the health of miners, dust diseases, effects of gases, high humidity, and temperatures.

Mr. President, with the limited time available it has been possible to tell in only the most general way something of the magnitude of the Nation's mineral industries, of the enormous wealth drawn from the mines, of the millions of people who owe their livelihood to mineral products, and of that branch of the Federal Government which serves the mineral industries. I hope that I may have been able to present a few facts worthy of serious thought when the time comes to consider appropriations for the United States Bureau of Mines.

WAR DEBTS, DISARMAMENT, CURRENCY STABILIZATION, AND WORLD TRADE

The VICE PRESIDENT. Resolutions coming over from a previous day are in order.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 141) submitted by Mr. TYDINGS on May 21, 1935, favoring conferences with foreign governments on war debts and certain other international matters.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

INDUSTRY AND BUSINESS COMMITTEE FOR N. R. A.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 142) submitted by Mr. NYE on May 21, 1935, making inquiry as to whether members of the industry and business committee for N. R. A. extension are, or have been, officials or employees of the National Recovery Administration or of code authorities.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, as the author of this resolution I ask for its indefinite postponement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be indefinitely postponed.

APPOINTMENT AND CONFIRMATION OF CERTAIN FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 152) submitted by Mr. GORE on June 15, 1935, calling on the Comptroller General for information concerning appointees or employees of the Government receiving compensation at the rate of $4,000 per annum or more.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I think this resolution should also go over, and I so request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF BITUMINOUS-COAL CONSERVATION BILL

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the resolution (S. Res. 167) calling upon the Attorney General for an opinion with respect to the constitutionality of H. R. 8479, the Bituminous Coal Conservation Act of 1935, submitted by Mr. BYRD on July 9, 1935.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, since this resolution was introduced the bill to which it relates has been disposed of. It is not the practice of the Senate or of the other branch of Congress to ask opinions of the Attorney General concerning legislation that is pending. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ESTABLISHMENT OF AIR CORPS TECHNICAL SCHOOL

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar is in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, a special order has been set for today, Senate bill 3398, a bill to establish the Air Corps Technical School and to acquire certain land in the State of Colorado for use as a site for said Air Corps Technical School and as an aerial gunnery and bombing range for the Army Air Corps.

I am informed by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] that the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH] is ill and unable to be in attendance on the Senate today. It is satisfactory to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] and the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS]—and, indeed, I make this suggestion at their request—that I ask unanimous consent that the special order go over to the next legislative day, and I submit the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I feel that it is only fair to say that, in addition to the courtesy suggested by the able leader on this side, I have made the statement that nothing was to be done today regarding the special order, and that whatever was done, it should be construed as not at all interfering with the status of the measure within the special order. I join in the request that the matter may go over until my colleague can reach the Senate.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, it should perhaps be stated to the Senate that last August, shortly before the close of the session, the bill mentioned by the able Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] was made a special order of the Senate for the third day of the present session. By unanimous consent its consideration has been twice continued for the convenience and by request of the Senators from Illinois. We have no objection to their present new request for further continuance under the conditions specified. I wish merely to indicate our readiness to do what is proper at this time to facilitate the prompt consideration of the measure; also the wish of the Senators who are sponsors for the bill to proceed to a vote. It is my understanding that the effect of today's unanimous-consent request, if approved, will be to bring the bill before the Senate at the earliest practicable moment in accordance with the intent of the special order when originally made by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CONSIDERATION OF THE CALENDAR ON THURSDAY

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY].

I ask unanimous consent that the call of the calendar under the present order be dispensed with, and that on Thursday morning next, after the conclusion of the morning business, the Senate proceed to the call of unobjected bills on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MEASUREMENT OF VESSELS USING THE PANAMA CANAL

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2288) to provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] has indicated his interest in this bill; and with a view to obtaining his presence, I shall suggest the absence of a quorum pending the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to state the rule as he understands it, although he is not quite certain about it. If the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma should prevail, it would displace the order just made by the Senate with reference to the bill in which the Senators from Colorado and Illinois are interested.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; it would not.

Mr. MCNARY. That is a special order and will take its place following the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly it would take its place following the bill just referred to, but this bill would have to be disposed of.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the special order has been postponed until another day, and the Senator from Oklahoma has been seeking to get consideration of his bill for several weeks. During the last session he attempted to bring it forward, and there was difficulty in finding opportunity. My thought is that we should proceed to the consideration of the bill; that the opportunity should be afforded the Senator from Oklahoma to have the bill taken up. The special order has been postponed, and there is now nothing before the Senate.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, of course I do not desire to impede the progress of this session of the Congress. The bill in question has come up very unexpectedly. No notice has been given of the pending motion. I desire to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if the consideration of the bill would lead to any controversy? Is there any particular opposition to the bill? Is it controversial in character?

Mr. GORE. I think it will lead to some controversy. The bill relates to the Panama Canal tolls, and there is some controversy in connection with its passage. The passage of the bill will be resisted by some of the shipping concerns of the country, and I think one or two Senators desire to be heard. Of course, every opportunity will be afforded Senators to present their views on the subject.

Mr. MCNARY. That being the case, the Senator from Oklahoma would not hope to dispose of the bill today?

Mr. GORE. I should not think so; no, sir.

Mr. MCNARY. Is it the desire of the Senator to proceed to the consideration of the bill today?

Mr. GORE. Yes. The Senators who are opposed to the bill are familiar with its terms and its objects.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to the motion being put; but I shall then suggest the absence of a quorum in order that Senators who are interested in the bill may have an opportunity to be present.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I have not quite concluded.

Mr. ROBINSON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. MCNARY. I am advised that there are two or three Members on the Republican side of the Chamber who are opposed to the legislation, or at least will offer some amendments to the bill. Those Members are not present. They may appear on the quorum call. However, I should oppose final disposition of the matter today, because we have had no notice that it was to be taken up.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think there would be no possibility of final passage of the bill today.

Mr. MCNARY. I think it would be eminently fair if we should proceed for a certain length of time in the discussion of the bill and then adjourn until another day.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that the Senator from Oklahoma indicated that in his opinion the bill cannot be completed today. My suggestion is that when the Senate shall have proceeded with the matter, and the true situation respecting it shall have developed, we can then make an arrangement about it.

Mr. MCNARY. Very well. That is fair.

Mr. ROBINSON. There is no disposition on the part of the Senator from Oklahoma to press for immediate action on the bill. His desire is to secure consideration of the bill, and a reasonably prompt determination of it.

Mr. MCNARY. I am satisfied with that fair attitude on the part of the Senator from Oklahoma. I only suggested that we not proceed with impetuosity, but let the final consideration of the bill be had when there are some Members present who are now absent, Members who probably would be here had they had notice that the motion now pending would be made.

Personally I have no objection to the bill being made the unfinished business under the motion, but I do desire to have a clear understanding that the Senate will not proceed to a final conclusion of the bill today, and that we may have opportunity at a future time further to consider it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber temporarily when this question arose. May I ask what the pending motion is?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has moved that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2288, to provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, and for other purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if I may be permitted a word, let me say that the bill is not new. It has been presented several times to the Senate during the years I have been here. I served on a subcommittee of the Committee on Commerce which considered the bill some years ago, and the Committee on Commerce decided against the measure.

It is my conviction that the bill is not in the public interest. I have said so on every occasion when the measure has been discussed, and I now repeat the statement.

When the bill was presented to the Senate it was referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals—a committee which, as I understand, has to do with the material, construction, and repairs of the Canal and other matters relating to the Canal itself. This particular bill relates to tolls, the tax upon vessels which are sent through the Canal. It is a matter which has to do with shipping. For that reason, when the question of reference arose, I made a vigorous protest that the bill ought not to have been referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. It was then agreed that there should be a joint hearing between the Commerce Committee and the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. Without any reference to the sentiment of the Commerce Committee, the bill was reported to the calendar. I think I am right in saying that the bill, having been studied by the Committee on Commerce and its defects pointed out, ought not to become a law.

Now the question arises as to whether or not, under these circumstances, the bill should be considered at this time. I still believe it is a measure which should receive the attention of the Commerce Committee before it is brought formally before the Senate. I hesitate to say these things because of my love and respect for the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals; but I feel that it is a waste of the time of the Senate to discuss the matter, because, in my view, it is not in the public interest that the bill should be passed.

For a long time there has been a conviction on the part of the Governor of the Canal Zone, or somebody in authority there, that a new system of measurement ought to be applied. It would result in a material increase in the cost of operating American ships. There are abundant arguments against the bill. I understand that in the Committee on Interoceanic Canals itself there was a minority report on the bill. Now the question is whether or not it is right, at this particular period of the session of Congress, to take time to consider this measure. Personally, I think it ought not to be considered now. Certainly it ought not to be considered until the Commerce Committee shall have had an opportunity to consider the subject on its merits and to make a report on the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I desire a more thorough understanding with the Senator from Oklahoma that he will not proceed with the bill to final conclusion today. Then I should not object to making it the unfinished business.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I think there would be no possibility of completing the consideration of the bill today. As indicated by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], he has been for many years unfavorable to the proposed legislation. There are two Senators that I know of on the other side of the Chamber—the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]—who share the views of the Senator from New York. However, this proposed legislation has been pending in one or the other branches of Congress for more than 20 years. Beginning, I believe, with President Wilson, it has been recommended by every President since his administration. It has been recommended by every Secretary of War since the completion of the Canal and the ruling which created the anomalous and chaotic condition which the proposed legislation is designed to correct. It has been favored, I believe, by every Governor of the Canal Zone since the ruling of the Attorney General which precipitated this confused situation.

I hold in my hand a letter from the President, addressed to me within the last few days, requesting that this measure be taken up and enacted into law. This bill relates to a dual system of measuring vessels which transit the Canal.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think the more orderly procedure is first to take up the bill, and then to discuss it. I understand the Senator from Oregon has merely requested assurance that the bill shall not be sent to a final vote today.

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Oklahoma says he does not anticipate that it shall be voted on today.

Mr. GORE. There are Senators who desire to be heard and will be afforded every opportunity to be heard.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is not a direct answer. It is possible that speeches directed to the measure will not be concluded today; but I desire definite assurance that final action shall not be taken today. If the Senator so desires, it is easy for him to give me that assurance. I am willing to go forward with the consideration of the bill, but I do not want it to be concluded today.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill, and that final disposition of the bill be not taken on this day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I did not hear the latter part of the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill, but that the Senate not conclude its deliberations on the bill today. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2288) to provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 412 of title 2 of the Canal Zone Code, approved June 19, 1934, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Tolls on merchant vessels, Army and Navy transports, colliers, hospital ships, supply ships, and yachts shall be based on net vessel-tons of 100 cubic feet each of actual earning capacity, determined in accordance with the 'Rules for the measurement of vessels for the Panama Canal' prescribed by proclamation of the President, November 21, 1913, and as may be amended from time to time by order of the President, and shall not exceed $1 per net vessel-ton so determined, nor be less than 60 cents per net vessel-ton so determined, on laden vessels, and on vessels in ballast without passengers or cargo shall be less than the rate of tolls for vessels with passengers or cargo: Provided, That tolls shall not be levied on a deck load, which is defined, for the purposes of this act, as cargo situated in a space which is at all times exposed to the weather and the sea and which space is not included in the net tonnage determined under the said 'Rules for the measurement of vessels for the Panama Canal', except on tonnage of such deck loads which is in excess of 20 percent of the net tonnage of a vessel so determined.

"Tolls on other floating craft shall be levied on displacement tonnage at rates to be prescribed by the President. In addition to the tolls based on measurement or displacement tonnage, tolls may be levied on passengers at rates prescribed by the President but not to exceed $1.50 for each passenger. The levy of tolls is subject to the provisions of article XIX of the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, entered into November 18, 1903, and of article I of the treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of Colombia, proclaimed March 30, 1922."

SEC. 2. The President is authorized to appoint a special committee of three members, to serve for not more than 6 months, for the purpose of making a study and investigation of the rules for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal and the tolls that should be charged therefor and holding hearings thereon at which interested parties shall have full opportunity to present their views. Such committee shall report to the President upon said matters prior to January 1, 1936, and shall make such advisory recommendations of changes and modifications of the Rules for the Measurement of Vessels for the Panama Canal as they find necessary or desirable to provide a practical, just, and equitable system of measuring such vessels and levying such tolls. Members of such committee shall be paid compensation at the rate of $825 per month, except that a member who is an officer or employee of the United States shall receive no compensation in addition to his compensation as such officer or employee. Such committee is authorized to appoint such employees as may be necessary for the execution of its functions under this act.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect on the date of its enactment, except that section 1 shall take effect on September 1, 1936.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, as I was saying a moment ago, there are two systems for the measurement of vessels transiting a canal; we have two such systems of rules in the United States. One is known as the United States registry rules; the other is known as the Panama Canal rules of measurement. The latter system was developed soon after the Panama Canal was completed. The rules were drafted and formulated by Dr. Emory R. Johnson, an expert on this subject, who devoted several years to a thorough investigation of different systems of measuring vessels transiting canals. A voluminous report was submitted on the subject. The President formulated the Panama Canal rules of measurement based on the Johnson report. They went into effect.

In addition to that, we have what is known as the United States registry rules of measurement. Those rules have a long history. They evolved out of this circumstance: As a matter of comity, each commercial nation, for purposes of harbor dues and port charges, accepts the measurement of tonnage of vessels of other nations as determined by their own registry. When a registered American vessel enters the port of Liverpool the measurement of its tonnage, as fixed by our rules, is accepted as final by the port authorities in Liverpool. When an English vessel enters the port of New York the English rules of measurement and tonnage are accepted, as a matter of comity, by the port authorities in New York.

The result of that system has been that each country has endeavored by its rules of measurement to reduce the registered tonnage of its vessels in order to lessen the port charges and harbor dues when the vessels enter foreign ports. That has been the main objective and consideration which from time to time has resulted in the reduction of the tonnage of vessels registered in various countries. For instance, within the last few years the Commissioner of Navigation has made changes in the United States rules of measurement which enable American vessels to pay reduced charges when they enter foreign ports. That system of rules or that consideration designed to reduce port charges in foreign ports did not control in formulating the rules of measurement for the Panama Canal. The Panama Canal system of measurement is based on the cargo-carrying capacity of the ships; the Panama Canal rules are based on the earning capacity of the ships transiting the Canal; which is a proper standard when tolls are to be imposed on vessels passing through the Canal.

I can cite one instance which is not typical. It is extreme, but yet it points the result. An English ship, known as the Empress of Britain, when it transits the Suez Canal pays tolls of approximately $29,443 per transit. When that vessel transits the Panama Canal it pays $18,941.25 toll charges. One reason for that great disparity is the fact that, under United States registry rules, a deck which provides passenger facilities is exempt. This ship, one of the stateliest that sail the seas, has one recreation deck. It had a cloakroom on that deck for the accommodation of passengers. The owners of the ship converted that cloakroom into a so-called cabin, put a bed or a couch in that room, and by that simple device lifted that entire deck out of the Panama Canal rules, because it brought that deck under the United States registry rules.

As I indicated a moment ago, this confusion—this dual system—resulted from a decision of the Attorney General of the United States some 20 years ago, holding that the act of Congress was based on the Emory Johnson report, which I have already mentioned. Congress passed a law authorizing the President to promulgate a system of rules of measurement and toll charges for the Panama Canal, but the act of Congress used the words "net registered tons"; and the Attorney General held, as a result of that language, that in case of conflict the United States registry rules controlled. As a result, a number of devices may be employed, which I shall instance before this debate shall have been concluded. Let me illustrate now: When an opening is placed in the weather deck of a vessel and is then covered the deck below is lifted out of the requirement to pay tolls. That is due to United States rules of registry. Fourteen Japanese vessels constructed last year, and transiting the Canal for the first time last year, by this simple device have reduced the toll charges which they are required to pay some 30 percent. Thus, the tolls which are imposed and charged are made subject largely to the arbitrary will—and I will say, not offensively, the selfish interests—of the owners of vessels by simply making a hole or a tonnage opening in the weather deck not less than 4 by 18 feet, I believe. The deck below is relieved of the requirement to pay tolls. The old Japanese vessels, some 22 in number, had not been constructed with a view to taking advantage of that loophole in the regulations, but recently 2 of their 22 vessels by a slight change in their structure have been able to reduce their toll charges.

Details will illustrate this point. The vessels had coal bunkers. They used to be coal-burning vessels; they are not now—they burn oil. They carry oil in two containers in the bottom of the vessel, and by the simple device of cutting a door between the old coal bunkers and the engine room they lifted out of the payment of tolls the entire space formerly occupied by the coal bunkers. The vessels do not use the coal bunkers. Cutting the door is of no substantial service; it is of no service at all, but simply by that device, permissible under the United States rules of registry, the vessels escape the payment of the tolls which they ought to pay on the bunkerage space. I shall submit more detailed figures before the debate is over, instancing other cases where vessel owners, merely by making a hole or tonnage opening in the deck, have reduced their toll charges.

The 14 new Japanese vessels measure, under United States registry rules, 204,000 tons, while under the Panama rules of measurement they measure 297,000 tons; but, owing to this dual system, they pay tolls on the 204,000 tons, instead of paying, as they should pay, on 297,000 tons. Their tonnage under United States registry rules is only 70 percent of their Panama Canal tonnage, as ascertained by the Panama Canal rules. So they enjoy a subsidy of approximately 33 percent simply by cutting holes or tonnage openings in the weather deck, and covering them, and thus they regulate the tolls which the American Government levies on ships transiting the Panama Canal, instead of the Government of the United States determining what the charges shall be.

The pending bill will do away with that dual system; one standard will be established, and each and every vessel will be required to pay on its earning capacity, no more and no less. Some ships may be subjected to increased charges by the change, because they have, I might say, abused the privilege at their hands, though "abused" is hardly the proper word, because the dual system of measurement permitted them to do that thing. They have simply availed themselves of the confusion or the conflict between the two sets of measurement rules, and they were within the law, but they pass through the Canal without paying on their earning capacity, without paying the charges which are really due.

There is no purpose in this proposed legislation to increase the aggregate revenues of the Canal. The annual budget of the Canal is about $26,000,000. The operating expenses are about $10,000,000 a year; the service charge on the debt and the return on the capitalized value of the Canal is somewhat over $15,000,000 a year. There is no purpose to increase the aggregate receipts or to cast any burden of that sort on the shipping interests of this or any other country; but the design is to equalize the charges, to put all vessels on the same basis, to apply the same standard to all, requiring each and every one to pay on its earning capacity or its cargo-carrying capacity, and not refer to the discretion of a shipowner the charges which he shall pay and which shall be collected on a vessel availing itself of the privilege of passing through this canal.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. If I understand the situation correctly, after the holes or tonnage openings are cut in the decks, as the Senator has described, and then are covered up, the ship companies use the lower deck for cargo-carrying purposes in exactly the same way they did before the tonnage opening was cut in the deck, and by this device are exempted under the present situation from paying tolls on the deck which is thus utilized.

Mr. GORE. That is the point. It is a mere fiction. I have referred to Japanese ships, but I have nothing invidious to say against Japanese ships or any other vessels. Our own vessels, by cutting a tonnage opening in the decks and by covering that opening—battening down the openings, I believe they call it—use the space below that deck exactly as they used it before. They make this opening watertight. They protect the freight. They use this space for exactly the same purpose, and yet it is exempted from the payment of tolls merely because of cutting this gash in the deck and providing in the space below what are called scupper pipes to let the theoretical water escape, the constructive floods which never pass through the opening above, never reach the deck below, and never interfere with the freight-carrying capacity or any other portion of the ship. Under the United States registry rules of measurement that tonnage opening in the deck exempts the space below, but under the Panama Canal rules that hole in the deck would not reduce the charges which this Government would collect from vessels passing through that great highway.

Mr. President, I wish to print in the RECORD at this point the letter to which I have referred, addressed to me by the President.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 6, 1936.

Hon. THOMAS P. GORE,
Chairman Committee on Interoceanic Canals,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR GORE: The enactment of bill S. 2288 providing for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, which was favorably reported by your committee on May 15, 1935, is essential to the proper management of the Canal.

The existing unsatisfactory, unfair, dual system of measurement whereby tolls charges are based on one tonnage, and the limiting factor on another different and smaller tonnage subject to manipulation, should be abolished. Control over the amount of tolls charged should be regained, and the apparently endless reduction in tolls paid should be stopped. The enactment of the bill will result in the reestablishment of the system originally intended which through certain technicalities, has become ineffective.

There has already been too much delay in the enactment of this remedial legislation attempts to secure which have been made for a good many years by those charged with the administration of the Canal.

The House has passed a similar bill on four different occasions, and I now urge that you make an earnest endeavor to secure its passage by the Senate at an early date.

Sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. GORE. I desire also to have printed in the RECORD at this point a letter which I received this morning from Governor Schley, of the Panama Canal Zone. The Governor wrote the letter at my instance. It is a clear and succinct statement of the disadvantages of the present toll system and the advantages which would result from the enactment of the pending legislation. I hope Senators will read the letters as they appear in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PANAMA CANAL,
Washington, January 11, 1936.

Hon. THOMAS P. GORE,
Chairman, Committee on Interoceanic Canals,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR GORE: I consider that the prompt enactment of remedial legislation contained in section 1 of the bill, S. 2288, "To provide for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal, and for other purposes", is essential for the proper management of the Panama Canal. The enactment of this law will correct the only feature of the Canal's operation which is not based on merit, equity, and efficiency.

The purpose of this legislation as set forth in the voluminous hearings held by your committee and by the House committee on similar legislation is to effect a readjustment not prompted by protests but to accomplish certain well-defined results beneficial not only to shipping interests but to the United States, the objects being: First, to reestablish in the present law the system originally intended by the Congress, which through certain technicalities has become ineffective—a system patterned after that in general use for ship canals which had operated successfully over a period of many years and which is designed to avoid the inequalities that this legislation aims to wipe out; second, to abolish the unsatisfactory, unfair, dual system of measurement whereby tolls charges are based on one tonnage and the limiting factor on another different and smaller tonnage subject to manipulation; third, to stop further and apparently endless reduction in tolls paid.

The present system, having no justification in equity among the several types of ships, should be considered as a form of subsidy to certain types at the expense of other types. Each measurement concession granted to our own merchant marine is enjoyed equally by all foreign vessels using the Panama Canal, thus gaining for them greater reduction in tonnage as a basis for tolls than may be obtained by them under the measurement rules of their own countries. At the Panama Canal every class of vessel which fails to pay its proper share of the tolls includes foreign-flag vessels. Those foreign-flag passenger and general cargo vessels now have the advantage of this indirect subsidy even when they are in competition with American-flag vessels in the unprotected foreign trade.

Since the aggregate tolls, based on the 1934 statistics, would be less under the proposed plan at the 90-cent rate than was actually collected in that year, it is obvious that any increase to any single company is an increase incident to the change to a fair system, and the extent of such increase is the measure by which that single company is now enjoying special privilege over fellow shipowners. While the 1935 figures do not present quite as favorable a picture as the 1934 statistics, this is due to the fact that more vessels took advantage of the opportunity to reduce their paying tonnage by making structural alterations, as was predicted. Especially did the Japanese vessels take every advantage of the regulations on new construction, and they are now reconditioning their old vessels, as is hereinafter stated.

In your report, No. 624, on the bill you refer to American vessels which had made structural changes for the purpose of reducing their tolls charges, and state that the enactment of the proposed legislation "would, in the main, require them to make no larger payments than they had been making prior to such structural alterations, and would effect only the withdrawal from them of a special advantage of which they had availed themselves by making such alterations."

A detailed recheck of the figures submitted in the testimony of representatives of some of the steamship companies at the hearings fully bears out the statement made by you. Some of the figures submitted by representatives of steamship companies were very much exaggerated. In the case of one general passenger and cargo line, where it was testified that the annual increase in tolls would be $400,000, the actual figures show an increase of $263,000, and even this increase would be further reduced under the proposed revision of the Panama Canal rules, so that this company would then pay approximately $50,000 less than before making structural alterations. In the case of a line that testified to an increase of between $290,000 to $300,000 through the adoption of this legislation, the actual figures show an increase of less than $64,000 at the 90-cent rate, or $94,000 less than this line paid prior to the making of structural alterations.

The figures relating to a number of large passenger vessels clearly show that the contemplated reduction in space included in net tonnage due to its use for public rooms or for crews serving passengers will so reduce the amount of tolls being charged such vessels under the revised Panama Canal rules that, at a 90-cent-per-ton rate, the amount paid by such vessels will in nearly every case be less than the amount paid prior to the time structural alterations were made for the purpose of reducing tolls that might be charge under the limitation based on United States rules.

The question involved in this legislation is not one of choosing one of two systems. The Panama Canal rules are definitely established as the basis of toll charges. Vessels are measured and certificates issued by the Department of Commerce in all American ports and by foreign measurement officials in ports throughout the world. Every vessel transiting the Canal is given a Panama Canal certificate setting forth its tonnage, and this is retained on board along with other ship's documents. It is not a second Federal system of measurement of vessels. It is a system for vessels which use the Panama Canal, American and foreign, and has no effect on American ships which do not use the Canal. It is not a duplication of effort; and the defeat of this bill will not remove the necessity for Panama Canal measurement, but the passage of the bill will make the measurement of foreign vessels under United State registry rules unnecessary. Under the present system the United States registry rules are used only as a limiting factor, a purpose for which they are entirely unsuited not only in theory but as judged by 20 years' experience and the conditions existing today. United States registry rules may be entirely suitable for the purposes for which they are devised, namely, to determine port charges and harbor dues in ports throughout the world in competition with foreign vessels whose measured tonnage has also been reduced to a minimum by their governments to meet such competition. Each system has its proper functions and neither one should be allowed to interfere with the other. The limiting factor should be on the price per ton Panama Canal measurement, as provided in bill S. 2288; then any warranted reduction in tolls can be accomplished by reduction in the price per ton rather than in fictitious reduction in the tonnage of the vessel.

While revenue to be expected from the transit of vessels through the Panama Canal may not be comparable with a private enterprise such as the Suez Canal, that revenue is determined by the rate per ton. The Suez Canal measurement system is considered sound by disinterested specialists. The Panama Canal system of measurement followed closely along Suez lines and, in the light of experience, is considered an improvement on that system. The Panama Canal rules are not obsolete nor in need of modification, but can be revised to bring them up to date in view of the development of ship design and of the experience gained over a period of 20 years. These rules were so designed as not to retard the natural development of ship construction or to penalize provisions for the safety and comfort of passengers and crew. Such changes as are contemplated, whether or not section 2 of the bill is adopted, will not be numerous. The features with which they deal are practically all known. They will in each instance favor the ship, and were rather fully explained by Panama Canal representatives at the hearings.

The following in regard to Japanese vessels is quoted from my annual report for the fiscal year 1935:

"In the hearings on the Senate bill last year it was pointed out that Japan had not taken full advantage of the rules regarding exemption of cargo spaces on freight ships, but that they were beginning to do so. During 1934 the 84 Japanese vessels making 258 transits showed a United States net tonnage of 1,133,535 tons and a Panama Canal net of 1,413,305, the United States net forming 80.2 percent of the Panama Canal net. In 1935 there were 14 newly constructed Japanese vessels which arrived for the first time. These made 47 transits during the year. For the 47 transits the United States net tonnage of these newly constructed vessels, which had taken advantage of the exemption of cargo spaces allowed under the United States rules, amounted to 204,976 tons, while the Panama Canal tonnage was 294,349 tons, the United States tonnage thus amounting to only 70.1 percent of the Panama Canal net tonnage. As there were still some of the older Japanese vessels transiting the Canal, for the total traffic for the year the United States net was 75.8 percent of the Panama Canal net, or a reduction of 5.5 percent in tons and toll charges from last year's (1934) figures. This will undoubtedly be lowered considerably more during 1936 as the older vessels are replaced or reconditioned to take advantage of the rules. This accounts, in part at least, for the substantial drop in the percentage for all vessels in 1935."

The passage of this bill will not increase the aggregate of the toll collections; it will eliminate inequalities in charges between different vessels; it will stop the making of structural changes in vessels which in many cases reduce the safety of the vessels at sea; it will make unnecessary the measurement of vessels transiting the Canal, except under one set of rules especially adapted to the purpose, such rules being an improvement upon though similar to those applicable to the Suez Canal; it will eliminate an expensive indirect subsidy which up to now has accrued to foreign vessels in much greater proportion than to United States vessels; it will stop the apparently endless reduction in tolls paid by a vessel; and it will so fix Panama Canal income that a change therein will be effected, as it should be, by a change in the rate per ton ordered by the President within the limits prescribed by Congress rather than by arbitrary changes in the measurement of vessels.

It is my considered opinion that the best interests of the United States require the enactment of this legislation. The Secretary of War in his last annual report urgently recommended its enactment, and the President recently stated that its enactment had already been too long delayed.

Very sincerely yours, J. L. SCHLEY, Governor.

STATEMENT IN REGARD TO PARTICULAR SHIPS—ACCOMPANYING LETTER FROM THE GOVERNOR OF THE PANAMA CANAL TO SENATOR GORE, CHAIRMAN OF SENATE COMMITTEE ON INTEROCEANIC CANALS, DATED JANUARY 11, 1936

The steamship Virginia paid $15,086 in tolls prior to reconditioning. Her Panama Canal net tonnage is now 18,170, and with contemplated reduction by an estimated allowance of 1,135 tons for public rooms and an additional allowance of 825 tons for space not now allowed for that part of her crew serving passengers, her Panama Canal net would be reduced to 16,210 tons, which at 90 cents a ton equals $14,589, or $497 less per transit than tolls paid prior to reconditioning. Figures for the steamship Pennsylvania are approximately the same, while the steamship California would pay approximately $800 less per transit. These three vessels are operated by the International Mercantile Marine Co. (Panama-Pacific Line).

The steamship President Wilson, of the Dollar Line, paid $10,433 prior to reconditioning. After allowing 410 tons for public rooms and 280 tons for the crew, this vessel would pay tolls on 9,511 Panama Canal net tons at 90 cents per ton, a total of $8,560, or $1,873 less than prior to reconditioning.

The Grace Line steamship Santa Rosa paid $7,267 prior to reconditioning. After allowing 500 tons for public rooms and 337 tons for the crew, this vessel would pay on 8,830 Panama Canal net tons, at 90 cents per ton, a total of $7,542, which is $274 more than before reconditioning.

The figures given above are conservative, and in some cases the savings to ships might be even more.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GORE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In what fashion does the Senator propose to change section 2?

Mr. GORE. I intend to move to strike out section 2. Section 2 provides that the President shall appoint a special committee of three members to make a study of the rules for the measurement of vessels using the Panama Canal and the tolls that should be charged therefor. It has been some 20 years since the former study was made. I thought it would be in the interest of enlightened legislation and administration that new rules should be formulated in the light of a study and research made at this time, in the light of recent improvements in vessel construction. Section 2 seems to have drawn the fire of the opposition to the measure, and in order to accommodate them and obviate their objection to that section, I shall move to strike it out.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, has the Senator from Oklahoma concluded his remarks?

Mr. GORE. Yes; for the time being.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

Mr. ROBINSON. I also ask unanimous consent that the committees of the Senate may have leave to report during the adjournment of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MONDAY, JANUARY 13, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the Father of our souls, supremely wise and good, dispenser of all our needs, let Thy blessing descend upon us in all its fullness. Quicken the good spirit in us and help us to fulfill the common duties of life patiently, promptly, efficiently, and without ostentation. We bless Thee for every movement that tends to bring men together into one great brotherhood. O let this broad, generous spirit possess all peoples of all races and creeds and join them in one great family. Thus shall be fulfilled that prayer which falls daily from countless lips: "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Heavenly Father, lead us forth to enact this prayer in our attitude toward all nations. Through Christ our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, January 10, 1936, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

THE FUNDAMENTAL ISSUE

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech I made by radio over the N. B. C. system last Friday night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech, which I delivered over the radio last Friday night:

Events have been occurring with great rapidity here in Washington since the Congress convened on January 3—only a week ago. Some of them have been of dramatic interest. I think it fair to say that the season was opened by a political rally which was held in the Hall of the House of Representatives at the Capitol at 9 o'clock in the evening of the 3d. The historic room had been turned over to the electricians and engineers of the broadcasting companies, who set up, strategically, a large number of microphones, connected them up with insulated cables, strung the cables along the floor, up the wall, and out of a window, from which aperture they finally hooked up with the publicity powerhouse used for occasions of this sort. Along the rail of the gallery were mounted and trained upon the Speaker's platform a battery of cameras, looking for all the world like machine guns peeping over a parapet. The vast floor was crowded with officeholders, three-fourths of them partisans of the party in power and the remainder members of the despised opposition. I should qualify this description by saying that among the officeholders none of the judiciary was present. Members of the Supreme Court do not attend political rallies, and, besides, we realize now that they were very, very busy upon other matters at that time. The gentleman who presided over the meeting and frequently led in the applause was Mr. John Garner, who, in the event of disturbance, could rely upon the assistance of Mr. JOSEPH BYRNES, who sat at his left.

The speaker of the evening was the candidate at the head of the ticket, Mr. Franklin Roosevelt. His appearance upon the platform was the signal for a prolonged burst of handclapping, lusty cheers, and triumphant whoops from the great throng of his supporters. That the stage setting might be more effective, a group of powerful electric lights, swung in a bracket from the ceiling, cast its rays upon his countenance just as he reached his place. It was very effective and drew forth an additional demonstration, which reminded me of Madison Square Garden at its best. Most of the speech was political and of the campaign variety. The speaker extolled his achievements without limit and excoriated his opponents without mercy, to the evident delight of a very large majority of his listeners, who expressed their approval frequently in the conventional manner. True, one or two of his statements were greeted with satirical applause or derisive laughter from the little group in opposition, but I suppose one should not be surprised at this under the circumstances. They were getting pretty rough treatment. In any event, their demonstration lent color to the scene. Apparently colorful publicity is an essential ingredient in public discussions these days, and what more advantageous place can be found for it than in the Hall of the House of Representatives? The speech lasted from 45 to 50 minutes, including the interruptions. The program of the administration, generally known as the New Deal, was described as being a "fairly rounded whole." There was nothing more to be done about it. It was complete.

Some of us remembered that N. I. R. A., which the speaker once described as the most important and far-reaching legislation ever enacted by the American Congress, and, of course, an extraordinarily important part of the so-called New Deal, had fallen by the wayside. Mr. Roosevelt forgot that. He also forgot, conveniently, that whatever recovery has taken place in the industries of the country has taken place since the N. I. R. A. was declared unconstitutional by a unanimous Supreme Court. With happy confidence he challenged the opposition to repeal any of his measures. Probably he did not suspect that the Supreme Court at that very moment was giving consideration to some of them, and that within 3 days the whole Triple A structure would tumble to the bottom of the fairly well rounded "hole"—invalid under our Constitution. The speech contained no analysis of the condition of the country, no detailed description of the workings of recently enacted measures, and no recommendations whatsoever for additional legislative enactments. At its conclusion the usual demonstration took place, the candidate retired, and the meeting adjourned. Thus did the President fulfill that duty laid upon him by the Constitution of giving to the Congress information of the state of the Union. All in all it was an extraordinary performance. Witnessed from the gallery it presented a spectacle never to be forgotten—the first of its kind in the history of the Government. Also, it was one which, I hope, will never be repeated. Some of us may be old-fashioned, but, be that as it may, we adhere to the belief that when the President of the United States seeks to perform his duties under the Constitution and to give information to Congress, a coordinate and independent branch of our Government, he should actually give information and should give it in an atmosphere notable for serious attention to public problems, for restraint in utterance, and for dignity.

The second important event was the transmission of the Budget message to the Congress. It was read in the House of Representatives shortly after noon of Monday, January 6. In it the President laid down the financial program of the administration as far as it applies to the regular departments of the Government. His estimate of receipts and expenditures in these same regular departments led him to conclude and announce that the so-called regular Budget would be balanced at the end of the next fiscal year. The expenditures for the regular departments are to be larger than they were last year and very considerably larger than they were the year before. In fact, it now becomes perfectly clear that instead of reducing the regular expenditure of the Federal Government by 25 percent, the appropriations as recommended by the President are much larger than when he took office. And we now know that we have a far more expensive Government, and to support it we will have to tax the people more heavily than ever before in time of peace. The promised reduction has been forgotten. But, more serious than this, the President in his Budget message says he is not able to estimate the funds which the Government must expend in the next fiscal year for relief. Everyone knows that relief expenditures will be pretty heavy at best. Whatever they may come to—$1,000,000,000 or $2,000,000,000—they must be added to the regular expenditures. This means that we shall have a deficit for the fiscal year 1937 in whatever sum is spent for relief. No one knows today what the deficit will amount to. It presents a grim prospect, for we cannot go on piling up deficits and debts indefinitely. Sooner or later a collapse will come. What a pity it is that the appropriations made for the support of the regular activities of Government have not been reduced by that promised 25 percent. Had that been done, we could have come mighty near balancing the whole Budget by the end of 1937, despite relief expenditures. As it is, no one knows when it will be balanced. And every thoughtful person knows that the longer it is deferred the greater the danger of inflation. I pause to remind you that the word "thrift" never appears in the Roosevelt vocabulary.

At the very moment that the Budget message was being read by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, Mr. Justice Roberts, sitting with his eight colleagues, was reading the opinion of the Supreme Court on the so-called Triple A case. There were no microphones, no cameras, no spotlights, no demonstrations, no interruptions. Every person present realized that the Constitution of the United States was being construed and interpreted in one of its most vital features; that the members of the Court, far removed from political turmoil and passion, had listened to all the arguments relating to the power of the Federal Government as outlined in the Constitution, that they had weighed every word uttered or written which bore upon the question, and that, finally, one of their number was expounding, on behalf of a 2-to-1 majority, the kind of government we are living under. The Court held that in passing and attempting to enforce the Agricultural Adjustment Act the Congress had exceeded the powers delegated to it in the Constitution; the Court reminded the Congress and the country that the authors of the Constitution, after delegating certain specific powers to the Congress, set forth in black and white, had added a provision to the effect that all those powers not delegated to the Congress nor forbidden to the States are reserved to the States and to the people—this last in the tenth amendment. Among the powers delegated there cannot be found any power to regulate farm production. In fact, no such thing was ever dreamed of until very recently. True, the power to levy taxes is conferred upon the Congress, but the Court held that this power to tax cannot be used by the Congress as a device for the exercise of other powers which are reserved to the States and to the people, such as the power to regulate the operation of a farm.

In a series of striking illustrations the Court demonstrates that if the power to tax can be used as a device for the seizing of power to regulate a farm, then it could be used in the seizing of power to regulate anything and everything—the very daily lives of the people. Manifestly such a construction would result eventually in taking away from the States all of the powers reserved to them in the Constitution, and, finally, in the utter destruction of the Federal Union of States and the right of local self-government—the very thing which the Constitution was intended to prevent. This decision, coupled with the famous N. I. R. A. decision of June 1935, completes the demolition of most of the New Deal program. The authors and defenders of the Constitution down through the generations have realized that the love of liberty is inherent in the soul of man and that its possession is the most precious of all possessions. Knowing this, they decided at the very beginning, and they have maintained it until this day, that the centralization of power, the concentration of it in the hands of an imperial government, would inevitably result in substituting despotism for liberty. History oft repeated has demonstrated this. Therefore, they said, we will set up a National Government and give it certain powers—powers sufficient to enable it to preside over the destinies of the Nation as a whole—but we will forbid it to seize any other powers until we, the people in the several States, give our consent through the adoption of an appropriate amendment to the fundamental law. But one ideal inspires this philosophy. It is the ideal of liberty which men have pursued for thousands of years and which has never flourished anywhere upon the face of the earth so gloriously as it has flourished right here in the United States.

If liberty is to be lost to us and to our children, then it must be lost as the result of our own deliberate determination to surrender it. No one will deny that there are many well-intentioned people who believe that we have reached a stage in our development at which it is necessary that the individual should be subject to the regulation of a central government as he attempts to earn his living from day to day. Controlled by the President and a group of his advisors who believe with him, the Congress has passed a series of acts within the last 3 years with this objective in view. At the beginning the program was started under the plea of an emergency, but as it developed from month to month it soon became apparent that the President intended that it should be permanent. With a rollicking, boyish recklessness he has led his Congress along this road at a terrific pace, passing measure after measure, regardless of doubts as to their validity, regardless of the warnings of thoughtful men who were convinced, in ever-increasing numbers, that the whole thing flew straight in the face of those limitations which the Constitution imposes upon congressional power in the interest of liberty. Heedless of warnings they hastened to spread their system. They set up a huge bureaucracy numbering thousands and thousands clothed with power to delve into the affairs of the people, and finally, the power to punish men with fines and imprisonment if they dared attempt to earn their living in a way not prescribed by the central government.

The amazing thing is that Mr. Roosevelt and his followers call themselves liberals. They do these things in the name of the more abundant life. Can life be abundant, in the best sense of the word, to a farmer who is threatened with a jail sentence for raising and selling potatoes in excess of the quantity prescribed for him by the Government at Washington? Is that man a liberal who insists that his neighbor shall be fined and sent to jail for selling his product or his services at a price differing from the figure fixed by the bureaucracy? If this is the more abundant life, and if these people are liberals, then a great many of us have misconstrued the meaning of those words. Some may say that we should not be excited about all these things any more, for the Supreme Court has pointed out the utter nullity of these two remarkable measures, N. I. R. A. and Triple A. Let me suggest in all seriousness that the people who are imbued with the philosophy of the New Deal are not content with these rebuffs. They are wondering tonight how they can retrieve their program. There is but one way, as I see it, by which they can proceed if, indeed, they are to proceed in orderly fashion, and that is by proposing a new amendment to the Constitution specifically granting to the Congress the power to regulate all industry, all agriculture, and all local business transactions, and by persuading two-thirds of the Members of each House of Congress to submit such an amendment to the people in the several States, and finally by persuading the people in three-fourths of the States to ratify it. That is the orderly and logical method of procedure under our form of government. Will Mr. Roosevelt try it? If he does not, then he admits that the jig is up. If he does, he will be acting consistently with all his exhortations of the last 3 years, and, moreover, he will have placed the fundamental issue squarely before the people. In such an event I have no doubt whatsoever of the result. The people of America, by an enormous majority, will demonstrate that, like their ancestors, they prefer to be masters of their government rather than its subjects.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, we are very anxious to proceed with as much dispatch as possible on the appropriation bill. For this reason I ask unanimous consent at this time that business in order on Calendar Wednesday of this week may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that proceedings on the motion to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates and for controlled expansion of the currency be postponed for 2 weeks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from New York with withdraw his objection. The Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill to pay adjusted-service certificates passed the House several days ago. This is another bill, H. R. 1, to pay the adjusted-service certificates. Two hundred and eighteen Members of the House signed a motion to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from further consideration of this bill. We could force consideration of it today. We feel that by postponing it 2 weeks there will be no necessity for any action to be taken on it, because we believe that in the meantime the matter will be adjusted; but in the event something should happen to prevent its adjustment we have this bill here to protect all our rights. We have two ways of handling this situation: One by unanimous consent, the other by getting a majority to vote to discharge the committee and not make a motion for present consideration which will result in the bill being referred to the calendar and our rights will be preserved in that way.

I have talked to many Members of the House about it, and all of them have agreed that this is the proper procedure. Under the circumstances, I wish the gentleman would not object but would be willing for the matter to go over 2 weeks.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I objected because this petition has been hanging over the head of the House for a long time. I am opposed to it. I should like to get it out of the way. Furthermore, we have just passed a bill to pay the adjusted-service certificates, and it is now in the hands of the Senate. I do not like the idea of having a motion for payment of the veterans through inflation outstanding as a threat to the Members of the House as to what they should do or what some group wants to do in the way of payment of the adjusted-service certificates through starting the printing presses. Being opposed to inflation, or any printing-press method of payment, I shall have to object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that his is a futile objection, because, under the rules and under his rights, the gentleman from Texas nevertheless can call up this privileged motion. And after he passes it he can secure recognition by the Chair, and then he can move a postponement for 2 weeks and carry the motion, because he has enough votes to carry it; so why put the gentleman from Texas to all this trouble? Why not let him do by unanimous consent in half a minute something which would otherwise take probably an hour?

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. RICH. I may say to my friend the gentleman from Texas that if a man is opposed to inflation he ought to do everything within his power to keep inflation from being started, whether it takes 2 or 3 hours or 2 or 3 minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. I may state to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that if this request is not agreed to, I expect to call up the motion and ask to discharge the committee from further consideration of the bill.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. When this motion is voted on, I expect then to make a motion to postpone it for 2 weeks; and I believe the gentleman will agree with me that the motion will carry or I will not make a motion for consideration and permit the bill to be referred to the calendar. In view of these facts, I think he should withdraw his objection and permit the request to be granted. I am certainly not going to refuse to do everything in my power to keep the bill alive for emergency purposes. The bill will not be called up unless the Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill fails to be enacted. The gentleman from New York attempted to get an amendment attached to the Vinson-Patman-McCormack bill that would have destroyed, one that would prevent the veterans from getting their money. Evidently it is not through any particular desire on his part that the debt be paid that prompts his objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I want to be courteous to the gentleman from Texas, but I am opposed to inflation. If the Democratic majority wants to take the responsibility of backing inflation or the issuance of greenbacks, that is their responsibility; but anything I can do to stop inflation I propose to do. The veterans have already been crucified on the cross of inflation and currency expansion long enough, and it is time to put an end to such tactics and pass the bonus bill providing for immediate payment of the adjusted-service certificates to the World War veterans as a relief measure without jeopardizing its passage by further attempts to attach inflationary and printing-press methods of payment.

Mr. Speaker, in order to head off or prevent the efforts of the currency expansionists to use the bonus as a vehicle for inflation and perhaps delay or defeat the bonus bill, I am compelled to object.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I move to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates and for controlled expansion of the currency.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FISH. Is this motion debatable? Do not the rules provide 20 minutes' debate?

The SPEAKER. In the matter of debate on a motion to discharge a committee from the consideration of a bill, the rule provides:

> After 20 minutes' debate, one-half in favor of the proposition and one-half in opposition thereto, the House shall proceed to vote on the motion to discharge.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] moves that the Committee on Ways and Means be discharged from further consideration of the bill.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move the previous question?

The SPEAKER. Not at this time, under the rule. The rule provides for 20 minutes' debate. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] to control the time.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the Chair will recognize someone in opposition for 10 minutes?

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair just stated, and that is what the rule provides.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] would like to be recognized in opposition to the motion.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the committee before which the bill is pending is entitled to be recognized in opposition, if he desires.

Mr. SNELL. I think the Chair is right about that.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means from further consideration of the bill (H. R. 1) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates and for controlled expansion of the currency.

The question was taken: and on a division (demanded by Mr. PATMAN and Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 47, noes 27.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 228, nays 100, answered "present" 1, not voting 101, as follows:

CLAIM OF WILLIAM L. JENKINS, FORMERLY CONSUL OF THE UNITED STATES AT TREBIZOND, TURKEY

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following further message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims:

To the Congress of the United States:

I enclose herewith a report which the Secretary of State has addressed to me in regard to a claim of William L. Jenkins, Esq., formerly consul of the United States at Trebizond, Turkey, for the sum of $481.50 appropriated for his relief in Public Act No. 519, approved July 3, 1930, and used by the General Accounting Office as a set-off against an amount of $2,000 due from him for his failure to properly account for the proceeds of a draft in that sum drawn by him on December 8, 1916.

Legislation authorizing and directing the Comptroller General of the United States to credit Mr. Jenkins' accounts with the sum of $2,000 is contained in Private Act No. 30, of May 8, 1935. No provision was made in this act for refund of the sum of $481.50 used as a set-off, but in view of the fact that the Congress enacted legislation providing for reimbursement of the amount of his loss, namely, $481.50, and for crediting his accounts with the sum of $2,000, it was evidently intended that he be fully compensated. It is, therefore, recommended that legislation be enacted providing payment in the amount of $481.50 for the relief of the claimant.

I recommend that an appropriation in the amount suggested by the Secretary of State be authorized in order to relieve these officers of the Government of the burden these losses have occasioned.

RELIEF OF CONFEDERATED BANDS OF UTE INDIANS

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 381) for the relief of the Confederated Bands of Ute Indians located in Utah, Colorado, and New Mexico, with a House amendment, insist on the House amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. ROGERS of Oklahoma, MURDOCK, and BURDICK.

REV. JAMES R. COX, OF PITTSBURGH

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have a message, in the form of a communication, read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to have a communication read from the Clerk's desk. Is there objection?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, what is the communication the gentleman wants read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can explain it.

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, this is a message from a great humanitarian, Father James R. Cox, of Pittsburgh, who is now in the galleries. He has written his sentiments giving a message to the House of Representatives with respect to his attitude toward old-age pensions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DR. RONALD A. COX

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2939) to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Ronald A. Cox and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any limitation relating to the time within which an application for a license must be filed, the Commission of Licensure to Practice the Healing Art in the District of Columbia is authorized and directed to issue a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Ronald A. Cox, Washington, D. C., in accordance with the provisions of the first paragraph of section 24 of the Healing Arts Practice Act, District of Columbia, 1928.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DR. ARTHUR B. WALKER

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8437) to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Arthur B. Walker, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think this is the second bill of this sort which has been presented to the House this morning at the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey. I know nothing of the merits of the measure, but I think it rather due the House that the gentlewoman from New Jersey explain why it is that special legislation is needed to permit these persons to practice medicine in the District of Columbia.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, may I say to the gentleman from New York that this bill merely provides for the issuance of a license to Dr. Arthur B. Walker, and the reason for it is that the time limit within which to submit applications was fixed by law, and, due to illness, he failed to take advantage of the opportunity. Special acts of Congress have been necessary in every case of this kind, and similar bills have been enacted for those doctors whose applications have received the approval of the District Commissioners.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman from New Jersey yield?

Mrs. NORTON. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may say to my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the rest of the membership of the House that when we acted on the licensure bill with respect to the practice of the healing art in the District of Columbia, there were a number of registered doctors who had been practicing here for a great many years who were away and on account of their absence were automatically precluded from the benefits of the act. We have three identical bills on the calendar today involving men who are being reinstated because they were out of the District at that time.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit, it so happens that this particular "healing art" doctor was sick.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is true. The others, I believe, were away; but in any event, there were very good reasons why they could not qualify.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any limitation relating to the time within which an application for a license must be filed, the Commission on Licensure to Practice the Healing Art in the District of Columbia is authorized and directed to issue a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Arthur B. Walker, Lincoln, Nebr., in accordance with the provisions of the first paragraph of section 24 of the Healing Arts Practice Act, District of Columbia, 1928.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DR. PAK CHUE CHAN

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 2013) to provide for the issuance of a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Pak Chue Chan, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any limitation relating to the time within which an application for a license must be filed, the Commission on Licensure to Practice the Healing Art in the District of Columbia is authorized and directed to issue a license to practice the healing art in the District of Columbia to Dr. Pak Chue Chan, of Washington, D. C., in accordance with the provisions of the first paragraph of section 24 of the Healing Arts Practice Act, District of Columbia, 1928.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 3097. An act relating to interest and usury affecting parties under the jurisdiction of courts of the United States functioning in countries where the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 218

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. WESLEY LLOYD, late a Representative from the State of Washington.

Resolved, That a committee of two Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the deceased Representative.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative the Senate do now adjourn.

TO AUTHORIZE THE OPENING OF GRAVES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1016) to empower the health officer of the District of Columbia to authorize the opening of graves and the disinterment and reinterment of dead bodies in cases where death has been caused by certain contagious diseases. I ask that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the lady from New Jersey that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 93 of title 5 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia is hereby amended by adding thereto the following proviso: "Provided, That the health officer of the District of Columbia may, in his discretion, authorize the opening, under sanitary precautions, of any such grave, and the disinterment and reinterment in the same grave or other suitable burial ground, of the dead body of any person who has died of any of the contagious diseases enumerated above."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING THE TEACHERS' SALARY ACT

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8577) to amend the Teachers' Salary Act of the District of Columbia approved June 4, 1924, as amended, in relation to raising the trade or vocational schools to the level of junior high schools, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the lady from New Jersey yield?

Mrs. NORTON. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. How far reaching is this bill—how many teachers does it cover?

Mrs. NORTON. I have a report from Superintendent Ballou, which I think will answer the question. It is estimated that it will cost about $7,500 a year.

Mr. BLANTON. How many teachers does it cover?

Mrs. NORTON. I think about 50.

Mr. BLANTON. Not over 50?

Mrs. NORTON. I do not think so.

Mr. BLANTON. And it will cost only about $7,500 a year?

Mrs. NORTON. That is about the estimate.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the lady from New Jersey yield?

Mrs. NORTON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Are these teachers employed in the day schools?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes; and this simply means raising them in the trade or vocational schools to the level of junior high schools.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Are any of them teachers in the night schools?

Mrs. NORTON. The bill covers all trade or vocational school teachers.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Are any of these teachers in the day schools drawing two salaries?

Mrs. NORTON. Not at all.

Mr. O'MALLEY. There are teachers in the day schools that teach at night and draw another salary. I hope that they will employ teachers on a little different basis, so that it can be spread around and the teachers will not be drawing the salaries for teaching in the daytime and an extra salary for teaching at night.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BLANTON. I have no objection to that, but the lady has promised to give me some time.

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. BLANTON. She has an hour, and she has agreed to give me 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The lady from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it is the purpose of this act to raise the trade or vocational schools from the present elementary school level to the rank of junior high schools as to salary schedule; and to provide other necessary legislation relating thereto.

SEC. 2. That on and after July 1, 1936, the salaries of teachers and principals of the trade or vocational schools shall be as follows:

CLASS 1—TEACHERS

Group A. A basic salary of $1,400 per year, with an annual increase in salary of $100 for 8 years, or until a maximum salary of $2,200 per year is reached.

Group B. A basic salary of $2,300 per year, with an annual increase in salary of $100 for 3 years, or until a maximum salary of $2,600 per year is reached.

CLASS 2—TEACHERS

Group A. A basic salary of $1,600 per year, with an annual increase in salary of $100 for 8 years, or until a maximum salary of $2,400 per year is reached.

Group B. A basic salary of $2,500 per year, with an annual increase in salary of $100 for 3 years, or until a maximum salary of $2,800 per year is reached.

Group C. A basic salary of $1,800 per year, with an annual increase in salary of $100 for 10 years, or until a maximum salary of $2,800 per year is reached.

Group D. A basic salary of $2,900 per year, with an annual increase in salary of $100 for 3 years, or until a maximum salary of $3,200 per year is reached.

CLASS 3—PRINCIPALS

A basic salary of $3,500 per year, with an annual increase in salary of $100 for 5 years, or until a maximum salary of $4,000 per year is reached.

SEC. 3. That the Board of Education is hereby authorized, empowered, and directed to classify and assign the teachers and principals in the service in trade or vocational schools on July 1, 1936, to the salary classes and positions in the foregoing salary schedule for said trade or vocational schools, in accordance with such rules as the Board of Education may prescribe.

SEC. 4. That the Board of Education is authorized and empowered to establish occupational schools on the elementary school level for pupils not prepared to pursue vocational courses in the trade or vocational schools; and also to carry on trade or vocational courses on the senior high school level or in senior high schools.

SEC. 5. The appointments, assignments, and transfers of teachers and principals authorized in this act shall be made in accordance with the act approved June 20, 1906, as amended. (Public, No. 254.)

SEC. 6. This act shall take effect on July 1, 1936.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be upon another subject than District legislation, except that I shall make reference to one bill on the District calendar.

There is a bill coming up this afternoon which, in my judgment, would hamper and interfere with the lawyers in every district in every State in the United States in exercising their rights before the courts of Washington. Unless they represented some matter from their particular locality they would have to come here and first obtain a license to practice in Washington, or employ some Washington lawyer, at whatever fee he might want to charge, before their client could be heard in the courts of Washington.

That bill is an improper bill. The procedure here, with reference to such matters, is already well defined, and the bill should be defeated.

GOVERNOR HOFFMAN INTERMEDDLING WITH JUSTICE

The subject I rose to discuss is another matter. It so happens that in the legal jurisprudence of the country men charged with crime, high crime, are not tried in the newspapers. They are not tried in statehouses, they are not tried in Governors' offices. They are tried only in courthouses, where there is a judge who administers the law, who is controlled in his administration of the law by rules of procedure and established principles of law, where witnesses are sworn, where no hearsay testimony is introduced, where no rumor is allowed, and where no it-is-reported-so-and-so is admitted in evidence. The witnesses are permitted to testify only to legal evidence under the rules of law.

I was astounded Saturday evening when I picked up the Washington Times and saw in great big headlines printed in black-faced type an inch long the following statement:

Hoffman will order arrest of Dr. Condon.

Then in the next edition of that paper, in great big headlines covering the whole top of the page, which are large enough for one to read across this Chamber, there was the following:

Hoffman will order arrest of Dr. Condon.

Thank God, in the United States there is not a Governor who sits in any Governor's office in any State who has any authority to order the arrest of anybody. The Bill of Rights protects the citizens of the United States and provides that they shall be secure in their property and in their person against unlawful seizure except by due process of law.

Talk about Hoffman ordering somebody's arrest! He has no power or authority whatsoever to order the arrest of Dr. Condon, and he will not be arrested, and this paper, which has eminent counsel, surely knew that fact. And when Governor Hoffman continues to meddle in this case and permits headlines like that to go into the press against a citizen of the United States he knows he has no such power, and he ought to have corrected it if he did not authorize it; and if he authorized it, he ought to be impeached. The people are getting tired of yellow journalism in this country playing up arch criminals in a way that would seek to get for them the sympathy of respectable, decent people.

This morning's newspaper asserted that Governor Hoffman said he "was going to see to it that Bruno Hauptmann was not railroaded into the electric chair." Railroaded! When approximately a year has passed since he committed that dastardly, cowardly crime, and he has been convicted by a court and jury of one of the worst crimes known to the annals of criminology, when he caused this whole Nation to be grief-stricken, when for weeks he wrung the heartstrings of every father and mother in the whole of Christendom by the heinous crime which he committed, and he has remained unpunished for nearly a year. Talk about railroading him, when now, after this long delay, due process of law is to be exercised and he is about to get the just punishment that he should have gotten months ago. I do not blame Shakespeare for deprecating against the delay of courts, against the law's delay. The same law's delay that disgusted Shakespeare in his time has disgusted every decent citizen in the United States. If Bruno Hauptmann had 100 lives and could be electrocuted 100 times he would not be adequately punished for the atrocious crime he committed.

The yellow journalism of this country, in order to commercialize this crime and sell their papers, has been playing up Hauptmann, his picture, the pictures of his wife and little child, for months and months to create sympathy in his behalf. But they never refer to the suffering of Colonel Lindbergh, or of his wife, or of their families, or of the fathers and mothers all over the country who grieved with them.

I was thinking about England, and about British justice. Why is it that they do not have kidnaping in Great Britain? It is because the Government does not tolerate it. No yellow journal in Great Britain could play up the murderer and kidnaper of a little child in the way that Hauptmann has been paraded before the people of the United States for the last 10 months. The people of Great Britain would not stand for it. Hauptmann would have been convicted and would have been punished months ago over there. Hence they do not have kidnaping in Great Britain. We have more murders committed in one little section of the United States in 1 year than are committed in 5 years in the whole of the Kingdom of Great Britain.

What has Dr. Condon done that would justify such headlines as that "Hoffman will order arrest of Dr. Condon"? What crime has Dr. Condon committed? None! Who is Hoffman that he has such power? Thank God, under the law of this country no such power exists in any Governor to arrest any man unless he has committed an act of lawlessness in the presence of an official who has power to arrest or unless he is charged with crime. What crime has Dr. Condon been charged with? He has been here for months. He did what he could to help the pride of America, Colonel Lindbergh, find his child. He did what he could to help ferret out that crime. He did what he could to apprehend the perpetrator of that vile deed. And now he is insulted by a Governor who has been working overtime trying to find some flimsy excuse to save a despised murderer from just punishment.

Does not Governor Hoffman know that for $100—for twenty $5 bills—the underworld gangdom that is now turning heaven and earth upside down trying to save Hauptmann could find 20 crooks who would willingly swear to anything suggested to them? Is Governor Hoffman to believe every unreasonable story that is told to him? Does he want the people of the United States to have a contempt for the courts? Does he want the people to have disrespect for law and order? Does he want all decent people to hate him? If he keeps on, he will not have the respect of any decent man or woman in the United States.

After Bruno Hauptmann has been duly tried and duly convicted in accord with the law of the land, and all higher courts have refused to grant him any clemency, and the Board of Pardons of New Jersey by practically a unanimous vote has refused to set aside the death sentence, what right has Governor Hoffman to interfere?

Is Governor Hoffman, without law or any authority, going to constitute himself a trial court and at nighttime commune with the prisoner and reach a decision based wholly upon hearsay and rumor?

What right has Governor Hoffman to criticize Dr. Condon? He is condemned simply because he wants to take a rest. The papers do not tell you that for weeks he has been deluged with every kind of threat that could come to a decent citizen from the gangdom of the world—threats of violence to himself and family; the same kind of threats of violence that were sent to Colonel Lindbergh and his family.

When Colonel Lindbergh saw fit to place his wife and little child beyond such threats, when they told Hauptmann about it, the papers have the indecency to print that Hauptmann said, "What is the matter with Colonel Lindbergh? Is he scared? Is he afraid to stay here?" The idea of Hauptmann talking about a decent citizen like Colonel Lindbergh in such language! Lindbergh, the man who braved the perils of the high seas and crossed the ocean alone in demonstrating science; a man who is the pride of America! Colonel Lindbergh has more courage and bravery in his little fingernail than Hauptmann ever had during his entire lifetime. Every time he hears he is going to die, the papers say Hauptmann cries about it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Later I will if I have time.

That you may see just how far this yellow journalism goes in playing up gangdom and trying to create sympathy for murderers who have been duly convicted in court, I want every colleague here, if he has not already done so, to get page 3 of the Washington Times for Friday, January 10, 1936, and read these several long columns about the execution of four murderers in New York the other night; playing on the sympathies of the people to make the people believe that those four murderers were not properly executed; to create sympathy for them. That kind of journalism does more to foster and create mob sentiment in the United States than everything else combined.

Hoffman continually talks about some new evidence being discovered. From whom and by whom? "It is reported so-and-so." All the hearsay evidence that he has put before the country so far would have been thrown out of court if it had been offered at the time of the trial of Hauptmann. The court permits only legal evidence. It does not permit manufactured, hearsay, anonymous evidence. They could not have introduced any of it if it had been offered at his trial in a court of justice. The court would have ruled it out. That is the reason why we have trials in courthouses. When the State brings on a witness and puts him on the stand to testify against a defendant, the defendant's lawyers have the right to cross-examine him; they have the right to impeach him if they can. They have the right to bring in witnesses to show he is not telling the truth. They have the right to wind him up, if they can, in every way known to able lawyers. So it is with the defendant. If he brings in a "cock-and-bull" story that does not conform to the facts, that is beyond the pale of reason, the lawyers for the State have a right to impeach him, as they did Hauptmann, and to show by rebuttal testimony that he is not telling the truth. This murderer of this little Lindbergh baby was convicted by a proper court in the State of New Jersey.

I want to take my hat off to the judge who tried him. I want to take my hat off to every member of that brave, honest jury in New Jersey who sat there like honest men and women through all those weeks of trial and had the courage and fortitude to see that the law was enforced. I want to take my hat off to that distinguished and brave attorney general of New Jersey, General Wilentz, who has done his duty by the law-abiding and law-enforcing public of the United States. He is the one who told Dr. Condon he could go on this trip. Dr. Condon was a free agent. He went to General Wilentz and said, "I am thinking about taking a little trip for a rest. Is it all right for me to go?" The attorney general of the State of New Jersey told him he might go. After that, because he left, Hoffman insults him, and these yellow journals, as soon as they found out he had gone, reported that one of the Hauptmanns said, "I don't like these people who run away. I don't like these people who get scared and run away", throwing discredit upon an honorable man because he happened to be involved as a witness against a murderer.

It is time the American people awakened and stopped this yellow journalism. It is time the American people have the courage to say to the newspapers of the country, "We do not want to read such stuff as that. We want you to stop it and stand for law enforcement. We want you to stand for decent government that makes society worth while and makes it worth while for honest men and women to live in this country." If the people do not awaken and stop it we will soon find others like Colonel Lindbergh who have to leave their own native soil and cross the water to a land that will furnish them safety and security from such harassment and such jeopardy. The time has come when the people of the United States ought to stop all these delays in criminal trials, when they ought to see that we have expedition. It ought to be the prime purpose that as soon as a man is apprehended he should be given immediate trial, and when he is convicted he should be promptly punished.

After the highest court in New Jersey has passed on his appeal and has said, "We find no error in this trial; the evidence is sufficient to warrant a verdict of guilty; the evidence is sufficient to warrant the judgment of the court that this man shall die"; after they have exhausted their means in the courts of New Jersey, and then the Supreme Court of the United States says, "There is nothing in this record that would warrant this Court interfering with justice being done against this man in New Jersey"; after all the courts have handled that case, it remains for this Governor of New Jersey, Hoffman, to say, "I am bigger than the courts. I am bigger than the law of New Jersey. I am bigger than the Supreme Court of New Jersey. I am bigger than the Supreme Court of the United States, and I am going to see that Hauptmann is kept from the electric chair." And, with great assurance, Hauptmann says, "I will not die in the electric chair." How does he know it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman from New Jersey yield me 5 minutes?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, the distinguished gentleman from Texas alluded to a bill, District Calendar today, S. 395, dealing with the qualifications of practitioners of law in the District of Columbia.

Lawyers resident in Washington, D. C., are entitled to some protection; for instance, they are entitled to protection against real-estate men who are engaged in a kind of indirect practice of the law. We should afford them some protection in the matter of conveyancing; but in affording protection to the practitioners of law in the way provided in the bill to be called up for consideration today I am apprehensive that the present bill is so drawn that Members of Congress who might find it necessary to appeal for their constituents in the courts of the District of Columbia could very readily be precluded from so practicing. I might cite, for instance, a case of the kind where a constituent comes to Washington and has an automobile accident and is at once served with process. Being a stranger here, he appeals, naturally, to his Member of Congress to do what he can. If the Congressman is an attorney, he might very readily appear in court. Otherwise it becomes necessary for the constituent to hire a local attorney to defend or prosecute, as the case might be.

While I do not want to be put in the position of imperilling a bill that seeks to protect practitioners of law in the District of Columbia, I do not want to be put in a position of causing criticism of Congressmen for seeking undue exception under the bill; yet, in view of the fact that literally thousands of constituents of Congressmen come to this city during the course of the sessions of the Congress and have no opportunity to look out for themselves in court, it is my view that this bill ought to be amended so as to accord this right.

Substantially, this is a good bill. I think the lawyers of the District of Columbia are entitled to this protection. An amendment, perhaps of the language on page 1 and page 2 of this bill, will put the bill in such shape that, I believe, it will be acceptable to the lawyers of this city. As it now stands it has the endorsement of the District Bar Association, of the Barristers' Club, of the Women's Bar Association, and a great many other legal fraternities here. They are rightfully entitled to it; and I believe at this time we can amend the bill so as to make it acceptable to all parties concerned.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. What is the real need for this bill? Are District lawyers losing cases to lawyers who are not residents of the District of Columbia?

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; I do not believe that is the case. There are those drawing wills and engaging in conveyancing and other like matters who are encroaching upon the domain of the lawyers.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman means trust companies and banks?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Anybody, whether it be an individual, a corporation, a partnership entity, anyone who is practicing law without any particular right or qualification. They should be denied this right. We send men to school to study law for 5, 6, or 7 years before we let them practice. They are entitled to some protection.

Mr. O'MALLEY. If the gentleman's contention is correct, anybody who is doing anything that might include in it a legal phrase ought to be denied this right.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that we hedge about the practice of pharmacy, the practice of medicine, and the practice of optometry with certain restrictions. I believe the legal fraternity is entitled to similar protection, except that it must not go too far.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will strike out the two lines I called his attention to, that would remedy one defect in the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I have submitted to the gentlewoman from New Jersey the suggestion that we ought to consider this in committee so we will have an opportunity to offer this amendment to the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the gentleman will offer an amendment to strike out those two lines?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am perfectly willing to do the very best I can.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Does the gentleman take the position that if two parties want to effect a conveyance of land that they must have a lawyer do it for them?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Not necessarily.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. That is what the gentleman is arguing; that is what the bill will do.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not arguing anything of the kind; but we all know there are those, not lawyers, who set themselves up as professional conveyancers and do legal work incident thereto.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, there is a provision in this bill reading:

Provided, That all conveyancing prepared or noted by such title insurance companies, etc., shall be under the direction of a member of the bar of the Supreme Court.

All it seeks to do is to include the necessary able legal counsel wherever conveyancing and title insurance are engaged in by companies and corporations. I think it is eminently fair and proper.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. It seems to me if a deed is presented to the registrar's office down here, and it is properly executed, probated, and so forth, that should be the limit of their investigation. If the parties in interest want to run the hazard of some layman drawing it, that is their risk, and the law has nothing to do with that matter.

Mr. DIRKSEN. It is not necessarily their risk, because if everyone who knows nothing about it is permitted to engage in that business there will ultimately be a lot of titles so beclouded that it will fill the courts with litigation; therefore I believe a public interest does attach in matters of this kind. The work should be performed by someone who is competent in the matter of conveyancing and the law of conveyances.

Mr. Speaker, I am not a lawyer, and, of course, the benefits of the bill will not and do not inure to me, but I believe that lawyers who may be Members of Congress are entitled to prepare and submit cases for their constituents whenever it becomes necessary. I also believe at the same time the District lawyers should be entitled to protection as against those who may seek to practice law and are not entitled to do so.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. If I understand the gentleman's position correctly, as long as a lawyer is a Member of Congress he is competent to appear before the courts here, but whenever he ceases being a Member he is not then competent.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman begs the question. I made no such statement.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman made some reference to the medical profession and other professions having proper protection. Does the gentleman have in mind that the medical profession is protected in the public interest, and that the legal profession should also be protected in the public interest rather than from the standpoint of the individual lawyer?

Mr. DIRKSEN. This is not protecting the lawyer alone. It protects the public rather than the practitioner. It results in rendering a competent service to the public. When they pay good money for professional services they are entitled to get good services.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman please state the amendment which he has in mind?

Mr. DIRKSEN. On page 2, beginning with line 9, I suggest that we strike out all the rest of the language in lines 9 and 10 and the first two words in line 11. You will note that the section as it now reads provides as follows:

> A member of the bar of the highest court of any State, not recorded as disbarred from membership rolls of the bar of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, shall be entitled to represent parties or interests in the courts of the District of Columbia in causes which arise from time to time affecting parties and subject matters without the District of Columbia.

Take for instance a misdemeanor that may come up here, involving a taxicab injuring one of your constituents. You would not be entitled to represent one of your constituents in a court in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GILCHRIST. I am glad to have the gentleman's observation.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, may I call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that we are not considering this bill at the present time. We shall go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider this bill, at which time there will be ample opportunity for the offering of amendments and discussion thereon.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I brought this matter up because it was alluded to by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, request may be made by the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] that the bill under debate be considered in the Committee of the Whole, and then we can have proper time to discuss it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. We are not considering this bill at the present time. We are still dealing with the teachers' bill. May I say that I see no objection to that bill and it ought to be passed forthwith?

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

QUALIFICATIONS OF PRACTITIONERS OF LAW IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 395) relative to the qualifications of practitioners of law in the District of Columbia, and move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill; pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that debate be confined to the bill, be limited to 1 hour, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 395, with Mr. WILCOX in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO].

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some unnecessary alarm by some of the lawyers here with respect to this bill. This bill does nothing else than what is done in the various States of the Union. It is intended to prevent anyone who has not a degree from a law school or who has not been practicing law in the courts from writing deeds or wills.

There have been many instances where such persons have written deeds where a man and wife, for instance, wanted to hold their property by the entirety, so that at the death of one the property would go to the survivor, and upon the death of one of these parties an entirely different result followed. Let me give you the illustration of a will, written by an amateur, which happened to come to my attention. A man left his property to his wife for life, and upon her death to her two boys for life, and upon the death of the two boys to their issue, if there were any such issue. Unfortunately the two boys died and there was no residuary clause in the will, and when the poor lady wanted to borrow $300 in order to pave her sidewalk, although she had thousands of dollars' worth of property, she was unable to borrow $300, because the only interest she had was the interest of a life tenant, and as she was about 65 years of age, no one would take the risk. We want to prevent amateurs from drawing up wills of this kind.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. A number of wills drawn up by some of the most expert lawyers in the country have been contested time and time again in the courts, have they not?

Mr. PALMISANO. That is true, but there is no reason why any will should not have a residuary clause for an emergency, so that in such event the property would go to someone else.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Is it not true that the more of these amateurs there are practicing law the more business there is for the lawyers?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes; but why charge it to the public? If you are going to take the position with respect to members of the bar that they are all a bunch of crooks, that is one way to look at it, but I do not look upon it in that way.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Are they not so regarded commonly?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes; and I believe we ought to eliminate such inference by eliminating amateurs who know nothing at all about writing a deed or writing a will.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Does the gentleman think we can get that idea out to the people by an enactment of Congress? If we can, I am for it.

Mr. PALMISANO. No; that is up to the members of the bar, and the members of the bar here in the District are trying to eliminate such practices by the enactment of this bill.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. CULKIN. I understand, then, that the full scope of this bill is simply to require that no one shall draw a deed or draw a will who is not a member of the bar?

Mr. PALMISANO. That is right.

Mr. CULKIN. Is that the full scope of it?

Mr. PALMISANO. Or any legal instrument.

Mr. CULKIN. Is the gentleman a lawyer, may I ask?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes; and in order to protect the attorneys I have offered an amendment providing that no deed may be written by a corporation without the O. K. of a member of the bar.

Mr. CULKIN. I am for that, but there seems to be a suggestion in this bill or some misunderstanding to the effect that this bill limits the practice of law in the District before the departments to members of the bar of the District of Columbia.

Mr. PALMISANO. No; I am not for that.

Mr. CULKIN. Is not that in this bill?

Mr. PALMISANO. No; of course, there is some question——

Mr. CULKIN. There is a lot of verbiage here that must mean something.

Mr. PALMISANO. Of course, there is some question here about the second provision, and my colleague on the District of Columbia Committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] has spoken about that. So far as I am concerned, I do not want to see any member of the bar who has been admitted to practice in the highest court of his State prevented from coming into the District and representing his clients.

Mr. CULKIN. It would be an unfortunate situation if the business of the District, which is largely Federal in its nature, should be limited to the local practitioners. That would be unfortunate and improper, I assume.

Mr. PALMISANO. In Maryland we acknowledge all members of the bar who are admitted in their respective States.

Mr. CULKIN. May I say to the gentleman I think that situation should be carefully guarded.

Mr. PALMISANO. There is an amendment to be offered to correct that situation.

Mr. CULKIN. It is really a matter of expert draftsmanship and consideration.

Mr. PALMISANO. That will be corrected.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr FITZPATRICK. Does not the State of Maryland permit deeds to be filed that are not drawn up by a lawyer?

Mr. PALMISANO. I cannot say that the State of Maryland requires a certificate that the deed has been drawn up by a lawyer.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Is it not a fact that some of the real-estate brokers are more competent to draw up a deed than many of the lawyers?

Mr. PALMISANO. No.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Absolutely so.

Mr. PALMISANO. No.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Tell me any State in the Union that will not permit an ordinary citizen to draw up a deed or have one drawn up by a broker and file it.

Mr. PALMISANO. You have a right to draw up your own deed if you want to, but you have no right to draw a deed and charge a fee as an attorney.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. A broker is often required to make a deed, and you are going to prohibit a broker from drawing up a deed which he has a right to do if he is a broker.

Mr. PALMISANO. The broker's business is not to draw up deeds.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield to me.

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. It has been held in the District that a deed which recites that I, John Doe, in consideration of the sum of $10, do grant, sell, and convey to Richard Roe, lot 1, square 75, in the District of Columbia, is a good and sufficient deed, and conveys the property whether the property is worth $10 or $100,000. If a deed is as simple as that, why should you make a man who wants to convey a $25 lot go to a lawyer and pay him $50 to draw up a deed, if he charged that?

Mr. PALMISANO. Well, that may be true, but suppose a man wants a joint deed to the man and wife with survivorship, the ordinary layman would not understand it. If he wanted a deed in common with his partner, the layman would not understand it. If he wanted a deed going to a joint tenancy, the layman would not understand it. There are three different tenancies that the ordinary layman would not understand.

Mr. BLANTON. If the matter was complicated, a sensible man would go to a lawyer; but here are hundreds of little deeds which any notary public or justice of the peace can draw just as well as a lawyer.

Mr. PALMISANO. These laymen follow forms but not the substance. They obtain forms and include in those forms things that they know nothing about, and that is what we want to prevent.

Mr. KELLER. Do not they have these forms all printed?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes, certain forms; and John Smith will draw up a deed for a joint tenant where it ought to be a tenant in common.

Mr. KELLER. If John Smith wants to take that chance, why not?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY].

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is particularly interesting to me at this time because of an experience in Wisconsin where the bar association attempted to pass what they called an integrated bar bill. That happened to be a bill which had for its purpose legislation providing that no one might be admitted to the bar without approval of a State or local bar association.

Apparently they wanted everyone to be under the control of the bar association. That was so ridiculous that it brings to mind a similar anomaly of a labor union wanting a law passed that nobody could practice his trade unless he belonged to that particular labor union. I do not think any reasonable mind would agree to that sort of legislation.

The real reason for this bill is that in the last 2 or 3 years a great deal of legal business has come to the District of Columbia, and the local, home-talent boys have not been getting what they think ought to be their share of such business, so they put the "heat" on. They want every bit of law business that possibly wanders into the District of Columbia to be given solely to District of Columbia lawyers.

They managed to pass this bill through the Senate without any reasonable discussion, with practically no hearings, and now it is over here in the House in the first days of this Congress. This is an important bill. It should not be acted upon quickly; it should be studied. I can see no reason why anybody in this District should not be entitled to do those little things which the ordinary layman can do without hiring a District lawyer, and that is what this bill seeks to prevent.

Mr. KELLER. It means more than that.

Mr. O'MALLEY. What is there about a simple deed, a simple transfer of property, that you have to hire a lawyer for; and if you have to do that, why do you have to hire a District lawyer? Simply because the District lawyers want to get all that business. A lot of business is done here that is not really District business, but it is done in the District. Many people who come here have their own attorneys back home. If this bill is passed, I believe they could not use the services of an attorney back home unless that attorney got into correspondence with a District lawyer and at least divided his fee. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PALMISANO] said, in answer to a query of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN], that the purpose of the bill is to put everything that has any legal phraseology in it into the hands of an attorney who is permitted to practice in the District of Columbia.

The District of Columbia belongs to the people of the United States; and anyone who has an attorney in any other State ought to be entitled to do anything in the District of Columbia that he can do at home; and anybody who is a citizen of the United States ought to be entitled to do in this District exactly what he can do at home, because this is not a State; this is the property of all of the citizens of the country; and when you pass a bill like this to set up a special way of doing law business in the District of Columbia you pass a bill that is against every citizen who is not resident in this District.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. One of the worst among the many bad features of the bill is that it wipes out all of the regulatory provisions in our various departments, such, for instance, as the Patent Office, which now passes upon all attorneys allowed to practice before it. It lets the bars down. You notice that it sets aside the regulations and provides that where there is a law firm of several members and one of them is licensed to practice before the Patent Office this bill, if you pass it, would let the rest of that firm practice there, regardless of the regulations of the Patent Office. And so with the other departments of government. This bill ought to be defeated. It is a bad bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes more to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. First of all, those safeguards with respect to governmental departments, such as the Patent Office, are set up within the bill. Secondly, I would say to the gentleman that surely he would not espouse a bill that seeks to let down the bars entirely so that anybody, whether informed on jurisprudence or not, could go into the courts of the District of Columbia. Certainly we cannot treat the District of Columbia like a mere stepchild because back in the States we have regulations and restrictions that have been set about the practice of law for the protection not of the lawyer but for the protection of the public.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I agree with the gentleman, and I have always believed that the attorneys need less protection than the public does against them.

Mr. DIRKSEN. That is a matter of metaphysics, into which I do not care to be drawn.

Mr. O'MALLEY. We can draw deeds in my State without hiring a lawyer to do it, and if a citizen of my State comes here and wants to purchase property or convey property, why should he be compelled, as this bill will compel him, to hire a lawyer? He has to do something under this bill that he would not have to do at home. He would even have to hire a lawyer to draw up a release, if he had a lawsuit down here and he wanted to be released.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But the gentleman must remember that every individual in this country has a constitutional right to practice in a court of law in his own behalf in a matter affecting his interest without any lawyer.

Mr. O'MALLEY. And if the gentleman will permit me to conclude, there is another thing in the bill that is very cloudy, and that is the matter of appearing before the departments. It is said that this bill does not seek to control that, but the wording of the bill is so ambiguous that it is my opinion that if the bill becomes a law the people will be excluded from going before the departments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes in order to say to him that it is not necessary to be a practicing attorney in a court of law to appear before the patent court. Any citizen can be a patent attorney. On his letterhead he can carry his name and underneath that the words "patent attorney," but it does not make him an attorney of record in a court of law. Yet if he is permitted to use that indiscriminately, he might fool many people into the belief that he is a practicing attorney in the courts of law.

Mr. O'MALLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, there has been a bill before our Committee on Patents for about 3 years which would forbid anybody holding himself out as a patent attorney who is not admitted to practice in the Patent Office.

Mr. DIRKSEN. So the gentleman admits that is the case today.

Mr. NICHOLS. Will the gentleman point out the portion of the bill which requires a man to be a lawyer in order to prepare a deed or a release or such matters as he referred to?

Mr. O'MALLEY. I will read section 218 (c):

> Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, * * * or thing of any kind, containing any matter forbidden by section 218 (b) is hereby declared to be nonmailable.

If a legal document was drawn up in the District of Columbia by an attorney who was not admitted in the District, it is my opinion that the above phraseology would bar that document from being mailed in the District.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is information I am after. On page 2, beginning at line 5, the bill reads:

> A member of the bar of the highest court of any State * * * shall be entitled to represent parties or interests in the courts of the District of Columbia * * * in causes which arise from time to time affecting parties and subject matter without the District of Columbia.

Does that mean that when an attorney of any State in the Union appears in the District court he can only appear to represent his clients in actions which arise without the District of Columbia?

Mr. DIRKSEN. The language in the bill means exactly that.

Mr. HOFFMAN. All right. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. NICHOLS. But the gentleman intends to offer an amendment striking that out of the bill, as I understand it.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time. The Clerk may read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, as amended, be, and the same hereby is, further amended by inserting after section 218 thereof the following:

"SEC. 218a. No person who is not a member of the bar of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall engage in the practice of law, or any branch thereof, in the District of Columbia; nor shall any partnership, corporation, association, or firm engage in the practice of law, or any branch thereof, in the District of Columbia, except associations, partnerships, and firms all of the members of which are members of the bar of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia.

"A member of the bar of the highest court of any State, not recorded as disbarred upon the membership rolls of the bar of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, shall be entitled to represent parties or interests in the courts of the District of Columbia in causes which arise from time to time affecting parties and subject matter without the District of Columbia. No court of the District of Columbia shall enforce against any such member of the bar of the highest court of any State any rule promulgated by such court which would require that there be joined of record associate counsel having an office in the District of Columbia or providing for the exclusion of such member of the bar from practice in such causes if the party represented shall file, at the time counsel enters his appearance, with the clerk having jurisdiction consent that service upon said clerk shall be service upon said party and his counsel.

"SEC. 218b. No corporation or association shall, nor shall any person or partnership forbidden by section 218a to practice law in the District of Columbia, use therein in any way except as hereinafter expressly allowed the expressions 'attorney at law', 'counselor at law', 'lawyer', 'attorney', 'counselor', 'law office', or any of them, or the plural of any of them, or any other title, word, or phrase as descriptive of the user or of the office, business, or practice of the user which indicates that the user thereof is engaged or is entitled to engage in the practice of law in said District of Columbia.

"SEC. 218c. Every letter, writing, circular, postal card, picture, print, engraving, photograph, newspaper, pamphlet, book, or other publication, matter, or thing of any kind, containing any matter forbidden by section 218b is hereby declared to be nonmailable, and the mailing or attempted mailing of the same to be a misdemeanor and subject to the penalties hereinafter provided.

"SEC. 218d. Nothing contained in section 218a, 218b, or 218c shall prevent persons or partnerships who are now or shall hereafter be admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of the United States, the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, the Court of Customs and Patent Appeals, or the Court of Claims, from practicing before the same, or prevent them from using the words forbidden to be used by section 218b when such words are used (1) in connection with other words stating the court or courts before which they are then so admitted to practice, or (2) in their practice before said courts or any of them; nor shall anything in the said sections contained (a) prevent persons or partnerships who are now or shall hereafter be authorized or permitted by any department, commission, bureau, agency, or other authority of the United States or of the District of Columbia to practice before the same from doing so, or (b) apply to the use by them of words forbidden by section 218b when such words are used (1) in connection with other words stating the department, commission, bureau, agency, authority, or one or more or all of them before which they are so authorized or permitted to practice, or (2) in their practice before the same, nor shall anything in said section contained prevent any person, partnership, or firm, now or hereafter registered by the United States Patent Office, to practice before it, and not a member of the bar of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, from performing any and all of the services incident to patent, trade-mark, copyright, and unfair competition practice before and out of the Patent Office and out of court; nor prevent any member of the bar of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, who is also a member of or an associate of a firm or partnership which is registered to practice before the United States Patent Office, but all the members of which are not members of the bar of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, from practicing law to the full extent of his authority as a member of said bar, or prevent any person from acting as attorney for the United States Government while actually engaged by it so to do, nor shall anything in the said sections referred to be construed so as to prevent any title insurance company while authorized to carry on its business in the District of Columbia from examining, abstracting, reporting upon, certifying, guaranteeing or insuring titles to real estates, settling sales, conveyances, and exchanges thereof, or doing conveyancing work in connection therewith.

"SEC. 218e. No corporation, association, person, or partnership shall do on behalf of another anything which that other is forbidden to do by section 218b or 218c.

"SEC. 218f. Every person, corporation, and association, who or which shall violate any provision of section 218a, 218b, or 218c shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 1 year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court, and the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the police court of the District of Columbia shall have concurrent jurisdiction of all prosecutions under this section."

During the reading of the section the following occurred:

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HULL: On page 1, line 8, after the word "Columbia", insert "or a member of the bar of the highest court of any State."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that no amendments are in order until the Clerk finishes reading the section, which ends on line 2, page 6. The Clerk has not finished reading the section. Amendments would come after the section has been read.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WILCOX in the chair). The point of order is well taken. The Clerk will continue the reading of the section.

The Clerk concluded reading the first section of the bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 5, line 8, after the word "therewith", insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That all conveyancing prepared or noted by such title insurance companies shall be under the direction of a member of the bar of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and each certification of, or opinion relating to, title to real estate, made by any such title insurance company, shall be over the signature of its attorney or title officer, who shall be a member of the bar of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia."

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask who is the author of this committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland desire to be heard on the committee amendment?

Mr. NICHOLS. I should like to have the committee amendment explained by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. PALMISANO. This amendment affects corporations only. It has nothing to do with individuals. It refers to title companies which set themselves up to guarantee titles without an attorney. The only question here is with reference to a corporation, whether it is a trust company or whoever it may be, and provides that they shall have attorneys who shall certify that they have passed on the title. It does not affect any individual. It does not affect a man who comes in here and draws up his own deed.

Mr. NICHOLS. Would this amendment prevent a licensed abstractor from certifying to a title to a piece of property?

Mr. PALMISANO. This affects corporations only.

Mr. NICHOLS. Well, a licensed abstractor would be a corporation. They are generally corporations.

Mr. PALMISANO. Anyone who can pass title under the law can pass title here, but a corporation which sets itself up, without a lawyer, and certifies to a title, ought to have someone certify to it.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. The amendment offered by the gentleman is that all conveyancing prepared or noted by such title insurance companies. I do not find any reference to title insurance companies in the preceding language. I am wondering what part of the bill the amendment refers to.

Mr. PALMISANO. In the District of Columbia all titles are passed upon by title companies or title insurance companies.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. There is nothing in this bill about such companies.

Mr. PALMISANO. We specify title companies in the bill.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. It seems very clear to me from the language of this bill that each certification or opinion relating to the title to real estate made by any such title insurance company must have the signature of its attorney; that this language would prohibit an abstractor from certifying title. If not, I should like to know why it would not.

Mr. PALMISANO. That language has reference to a corporation. It has reference to the title insurance companies. It does not refer to individuals. It does not prevent any man from drawing up his own title or making his own abstract.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Is it cheaper to get a title from a title insurance company or to employ a lawyer for the purpose? What is the average fee charged by a lawyer for drawing up an abstract of title?

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not know what his fee is in the District of Columbia.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The title company in addition insures the title.

Mr. PALMISANO. My experience has been that they will not pay a cent if the title turns out to be faulty. I had a case recently, a case taken to the Maryland Court of Appeals, where the title company tried to evade paying anything every time they possibly could. One of the title companies in the city of Baltimore is in the hands of receivers today.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The gentleman will admit, however, that if a title company insures a title it protects the purchaser to that extent, whereas if he goes to the ordinary lawyer the title is not insured.

Mr. PALMISANO. I say that a respectable lawyer will pay on a defective title quicker than a title company will. This has been my experience searching titles for 25 years.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Does the gentleman mean to state that if a title prepared by a lawyer is defective, recovery can be had from the lawyer such as can be had from a company that insures a title?

Mr. PALMISANO. Yes; that has been my personal experience.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in some of the States there are title insurance companies that issue certificates of title and really insure against loss. A title issued by such a company is worth something. There are no such companies in Washington. If you take up by correspondence the matter of a certificate of title issued by one of the Washington title companies, they will tell you they do not insure the title against defects or loss. They will charge you about $50 for their certificate of title, regarding an ordinary residence. They tell you the condition of the title, but they do not guarantee it against defects. This is something I contended for while I was a member of the District Committee many years ago.

I think there ought to be a law passed here so far as title companies in the District of Columbia are concerned, to require their certificates of title to guarantee against defects in the title. Then their certificates would be worth something. There are no such guaranty certificates now in Washington; and if a buyer suffers loss, the title company does not make the loss good.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Why should we not amend the basic law rather than try to do it this way?

Mr. BLANTON. We should not pass this bill. In view of the fact this bill affects every lawyer in the United States, and it affects every citizen of the United States who might have business in Washington, this bill should have gone to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KELLER. Certainly it should have.

Mr. BLANTON. Talk about inhibiting the practice before the courts here except by local lawyers who are members of the bar of the District of Columbia, I remember the case of a poor woman who came here from California, who brought with her two trunks that contained her personal estate she had inherited from her family. The trunks belonged to her. Some crooked relatives here got hold of those trunks and went so far as to try to put her in St. Elizabeths insane asylum to deprive her of her estate and her own property. She had no money to employ a lawyer. She was not from my State, but she appealed to me, and I felt so sorry for her that I went to court, and before Judge Hitz and a jury of the District of Columbia I represented her and tried her case. The opposing lawyer against her was Neil Burkinshaw, who has just been employed by Bruno Hauptmann. The jury found for her and she got back her property. I received, of course, no fee, but merely saw that she got justice.

Cases like that come up here all the time. Your constituents come here from the States. They may have their rights involved here either criminally or civilly. If you pass this bill as it stands you would not have a right to appear before the court to see that your constituent got justice. You would not even have the right to file an application for a writ of habeas corpus to get them out of jail, if they were wrongly incarcerated there. It is a right you ought to have for your constituents. And your home lawyers from your States have the right to appear before the courts here.

I was hopeful that our good friend the gentlewoman from New Jersey would withdraw this bill, because it should not be passed. I opposed and stopped it in the last session of Congress.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. MAY. As a matter of fact, this bill creates a monopoly in the lawyers of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BLANTON. Surely it does.

Mr. MAY. And it affects the lawyers outside the District.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly it does. Talk about conveyancing, there are lots of releases to be drawn continually, as there are lots of trusts on property here. When they are paid off, releases must be prepared. Almost anyone can draw a valid release. Most any notary public can draw an ordinary release in matters of that kind. This bill would require you, in connection with such legal matters, to get a lawyer. Suppose he saw fit to charge you $50 for doing something for which he ought to charge you $5. You would have to pay it. You could not get the service without the payment of his fee. Suppose he wanted to charge you $100 for a little $5 release? You would have to pay it, because that would be the law. You could not get the service without going to a Washington lawyer.

Let us take the matter of a radio concern in your district, and we all have lots of them. Practically every radio controversy, whether it involves a 50-watt station or a 100,000-watt station, gets into the courts here before it is over. By this bill the lawyers in your State might be prevented from having the right to come here to represent a little radio station in your district. They might have to pay a big fee to a Washington attorney here.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McFARLANE moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I think this matter has been rather fully discussed. Instead of having the title which this bill has, "Relative to the qualifications of practitioners of law in the District of Columbia", I think it ought to be entitled "An act to give the lawyers of the District of Columbia a monopoly of the legal business."

As my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], has well stated, this is a bill which is of too much importance to be considered in this short time. It affects not only the people of the District of Columbia but all of our constituents. It affects everyone in our respective districts. We are being called upon daily by our constituents to pass upon matters in which the various departments of the Government are involved. We would be violating the law if this bill is passed. Technically speaking, if we pass upon a request of a constituent, and we have no license, under this bill we would be violating the law.

Mr. Chairman, this is a bill which gives the District of Columbia lawyers a monopoly on the legal business and puts us on the spot in connection with every piece of business that we handle in connection with the various departments. This bill would require each one of us to take out a license, at considerable expense to ourselves, before we could gratuitously represent any constituent here in the District of Columbia. I think more consideration ought to be given to the question than has been given here. I think the bill should be defeated now and proper legislation should be brought before the Judiciary Committee and the House so that further consideration may be given this important matter.

Our constituents come here to see us about certain matters. Maybe we would have a constituent violating some traffic ordinance here. We could not go down to court to represent the constituent under the provisions of the bill. We would be violating the law. The license which you as lawyers receive in your respective districts and States is worth nothing if this legislation is enacted into law. We would be tying our own hands to properly represent our constituents. We do not want to do that. This legislation is too far-reaching.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that we ought to permit our hands to be tied and our constituents shaken down and high-jacked in such a manner as would be permissible under the provisions of this legislation. Therefore, may I say if the motion which I have just offered is agreed to, it will result in taking care of this legislation at this time, as it should be taken care of. The gentleman's amendment he has to offer, with all due respect to him, will not correct the situation. The bill in its entirety is entirely too broad in its provisions. The amendments he suggests will not remedy the defects of the bill.

Why not defeat this legislation before it goes any further? It is too far-reaching. It covers too much ground. We should not sit idly by and permit our hands to be tied so that we cannot properly represent our constituents before the various departments of the Government. We should not tie our hands so that constituents who come here to see us on important business may not be represented by us if and when occasion arises. This legislation goes entirely too far. We should strike out the enacting clause and work out a proposition which will give the District lawyers the protection to which they are entitled and at the same time not tie our hands in such a manner as we would be doing if we pass this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion.

Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the gentleman from Texas should take the position that he does with reference to this bill. He has made the statement that perhaps the residents of Texas who come here cannot be properly represented because they would have to get a member of the District bar. This bill does not limit representation to the members of the bar of the District of Columbia. Any lawyer from anywhere in the United States would be able to come here and represent anyone and everyone who may appeal to them for assistance.

Mr. Chairman, I would be the last one to ask the Congress to pass a bill which would prevent an outside lawyer from coming here and representing in the courts here whoever he sees fit to represent. My district is on the border line. There are as many people from my district come here as from any other State in the Union, and I as a member of the bar of the State of Maryland do not want to be barred from practicing here. If I do not want to be barred, I do not want to see any other member of the bar from elsewhere prevented from practicing.

I have an amendment here which will strike out on page 2 the words "without the District of Columbia" so that in connection with any matter arising here the litigant may be represented by a member of the bar here or elsewhere in the United States. All of this talk about monopoly is wrong.

Mr. Chairman, there was a reference made to title companies. I can show that recently a title company did not pay $1,400 until the case was taken to the Court of Appeals. The provision that has been inserted in this bill will result in the title companies standing by what they do. The matter heretofore referred to has been in the Maryland Court of Appeals for over 2 years. Not only that, but after filing an appeal bond they refused to pay on the bond. Mr. Chairman, those are the things that bring about legislation of this kind. They represent clients, insurance companies, and others, and then refuse to pay the bill when the time comes.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I understood the gentleman to say that any member of the bar of any State, under this bill, could practice here. Where is that language?

Mr. PALMISANO. On page 2, and if you will permit us, we propose to amend that language.

Mr. HOFFMAN. How can the gentleman say that in view of the language on page 3, following line 17, with respect to the Supreme Court of the United States and the Federal courts?

Mr. PALMISANO. We have two amendments on page 2, one of them striking out "without the District of Columbia", and then after line 15 we propose to strike out the balance of the paragraph.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMISANO. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Is it not a fact that this bill passed the Senate without any debate upon a unanimous-consent day and was not considered by that body except in committee?

Mr. PALMISANO. I have no knowledge of how it passed the Senate, but I believe the Senate acted after due deliberation.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I get that information from the RECORD.

Mr. PALMISANO. I do not know.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I am quoting from the RECORD of the proceedings on that bill.

Mr. PALMISANO. I am not here to say that the Senate blindly passes a bill without any consideration.

Mr. O'MALLEY. The proceedings of that body show that to be the fact.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WILCOX, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 395) relative to the qualifications of practitioners of law in the District of Columbia, had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the recommendation of the Committee to strike out the enacting clause.

The recommendation of the Committee was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BLANTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the enacting clause was stricken out was laid on the table.

SECOND AND THIRD CONVICTIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8820) to amend section 907 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901, as amended, up to and including June 7, 1924.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the House Calendar.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 907 of the act entitled "An act to establish a Code of Law for the District of Columbia", approved March 3, 1901, as amended, up to and including June 7, 1924, is amended by striking out said section and substituting the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 907. Second and third convictions: That whenever any person having been convicted of any felony shall thereafter be convicted of any felony committed after such first conviction, the punishment shall be by imprisonment in the penitentiary for the full term provided by law for such crime at the time of such last conviction therefor; that whenever any such person, having been so convicted the second time as above provided, shall be again convicted of any felony, committed after said second conviction, the punishment shall be imprisonment in the penitentiary for a period of not less than 15 years: Provided, That such former conviction or convictions and judgment or judgments shall be set forth in apt words in the indictment. On any trial for any of said felonies, a duly authenticated copy of the record of the former conviction and judgment of any court of record, for any felony against the party indicted, shall be prima-facie evidence of such former conviction and may be used in evidence against such party."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BRIBERY

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 8821) to define the crime of bribery and to provide for its punishment.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the House Calendar.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whosoever corruptly, directly or indirectly, gives any money, or other bribe, present, reward, promise, contract, obligation, or security for the payment of any money, present, reward, or thing of value to any ministerial, administrative, executive, or judicial officer of the District of Columbia, or any employee or other person acting in any capacity for the District of Columbia, or any agency thereof, either before or after he is qualified, with intent to influence his action on any matter which is then pending, or may by law come or be brought before him in his official capacity, or to cause him to execute any of the powers in him vested, or to perform any duties of him required, with partiality or favor, or otherwise than is required by law, or in consideration that such officer being authorized in the line of his duty to contract for any advertising or for the furnishing of any labor or material, shall, directly or indirectly, arrange to receive or shall receive, or shall withhold from the parties so contracted with, any portion of the contract price, whether that price be fixed by law or by agreement, or in consideration that such officer has nominated or appointed any person to any office or exercised any power in him vested, or performed any duty of him required, with partiality or favor, or otherwise contrary to law; and whosoever, being such an officer, shall receive any such money, bribe, present, or reward, promise, contract, obligation, or security, with intent or for the purpose or consideration aforesaid, shall be deemed guilty of bribery and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term not less than 6 months nor more than 5 years.

Whosoever corrupts or attempts, directly or indirectly, to corrupt any special master, auditor, juror, arbitrator, umpire, or referee, by giving, offering, or promising any gift or gratuity whatever, with intent to bias the opinion, or influence the decision of such officer, in relation to any matter pending in the court, or before an inquest, or for the decision of which such arbitrator, umpire, or referee has been chosen or appointed, and every official who receives, or offers or agrees to receive, a bribe in any of the cases above mentioned shall be guilty of bribery and upon conviction thereof shall be punished as hereinbefore provided.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EMPLOYMENT OF MINORS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 7505) to amend an act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the employment of minors within the District of Columbia", approved May 29, 1928, and ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are a number of Members interested in the defeat of this bill. It is a matter that has been before the House for the last 6 years, and I should like to know what arrangement we can make as to time for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Why are not the Members here if they are interested?

Mr. HARLAN. Most of them are here. This is a bill to repeal the protection afforded by the child-labor laws of the District of Columbia with respect to children working in the theater. Under this reservation I should like to know what provision we can make as to time.

The SPEAKER. If consent is granted, the bill will be taken up under the 5-minute rule without general debate unless the House should order otherwise.

Mr. HARLAN. That means there is to be no general debate?

The SPEAKER. The House could provide for general debate if it wished to do so.

Mr. HARLAN. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That is true, and the gentlewoman from New Jersey is asking unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The question now is, Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

Mr. HARLAN. I object to the request, Mr. Speaker, unless there is attached to the request that 1 hour of general debate shall be provided.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there may be 1 hour of general debate, 30 minutes allotted to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN] and 30 minutes to the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole and that there be 1 hour of general debate, to be equally divided between herself and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the employment of minors within the District of Columbia", approved May 29, 1928, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding after section 7 a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 7a. Notwithstanding the provisions of this act, the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, or a duly authorized agent thereof, is authorized to issue a work permit to any female person under 18 years of age and to any male person under 16 years of age, said permit authorizing and permitting the appearance of such person on the stage of a duly licensed theater within the District of Columbia, in any professional traveling theatrical production not considered offensive to public decency: Provided, That such person shall not appear on said stage after the hour of 11 o'clock in the evening of any day, nor more than 4 hours in one day, nor more than 28 hours in one week. Application for such permit shall be made by the parent or guardian of such minor to the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, or a duly authorized agent thereof, at least 21 days in advance of the scheduled theatrical performance, and with such application there shall be furnished a copy of the manuscript of the play, and the Board of Education shall advise the applicant of the granting or refusal of such permit within 10 days thereafter. The board or its agent may issue a permit when satisfied that the minor is receiving adequate educational instructions and that the health and morals of the minor are properly safeguarded."

SEC. 2. Nothing in this act shall be construed as amending, altering, or repealing the provisions of section 7 of the act of May 29, 1928.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to reserve our time until the proponents of the bill have presented their views.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, this is a bill which I think has been very much misunderstood. It is a measure submitted in the interest of theater patrons who prefer the better class of modern dramatic productions and parents of children who desire to adopt a successful stage career with actual stage experience in company with actors. There does not seem to be any reason why the District of Columbia should not permit children to participate in theatrical productions under necessary and proper supervision.

I want to say that before I came to Congress I had for many years been a volunteer in child welfare, and I would not bring a bill before the House if I thought for one moment that that bill was going to do the least bit of harm to any child in the District of Columbia.

I do not see why this bill, with its proper safeguards, should not pass.

I direct the attention of Members to the report submitted in the bill, and you will note that no less a person than our own beloved Chaplain, James Shera Montgomery, endorses the bill. If you will read his endorsement, and the endorsements of the Board of Trade, the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association, the Bar Association, and many other associations in this District, it would not seem possible that anyone could object to the bill.

The question has been brought up about letting down the bars with regard to child labor. This bill is practically a copy of the New York law, and many of the States have a minimum age as included in this bill.

To prove this bill amply safeguards the interests of the child, I will read you a portion of the report.

In brief it provides that boys under 16 and girls under 18 years of age may appear on the local stage. It limits them to not more than 4 hours daily or 24 hours weekly. Applications for permits for such appearance must be made to the Board of Education 21 days in advance and the copy of the manuscript of the play in which the minor is to appear must be submitted with the application. That absolutely safeguards the child. The Board of Education has the final right to say whether or not this play will be harmful to the child and the Board may issue such permit when satisfied, and only when satisfied, that the minor is receiving adequate educational instruction and that health and morals are properly safeguarded.

I do not think we could write a better bill. Certainly we know that a great many of the actors and actresses of this day started their profession as children, and we know they have been a great credit to the stage. Why should the children of the District of Columbia be discriminated against? The people of the District of Columbia have been deprived of a great many splendid productions because of existing law. For instance, one of the plays we all regretted not being able to see and enjoy was Green Pastures. We have taken this matter up with doctors, and they have submitted that it is perfectly legitimate and proper for children, safeguarded as this bill safeguards children, to be permitted to appear on the stage.

I cannot see anything in this bill that would in any way hurt the children of the District, and I sincerely hope that the Members will vote in favor of the bill.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. The gentlewoman mentions the Musicians' Protective Association as being in favor of the bill.

Mrs. NORTON. Yes; and we have other endorsements.

Mr. WOOD. And who are they?

Mrs. NORTON. There is the Musicians' Protective Union, and the Sign, Scene, and Pictorial Painters Local Union; also the president of the District Bar Association, the Central Labor Union, and many others. They are all in favor of the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. NORTON. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. As I understand it the present law is very restrictive.

Mrs. NORTON. That is true.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. No boy under 16 or girl under 18 can work on the stage of a theater.

Mrs. NORTON. That is correct. I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill which has been pending before this House for the last 6 years—ever since the Seventy-second Congress—and almost every term it has been voted out favorably by the committee, but it never appeared on the floor. The bill is very important, not only to the District of Columbia but to the United States. There are just about 11 States out of the 48 States in the United States that have little or no child-protection laws, and, with all due respect to them, they are not the progressive States so far as child protection is concerned.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes.

Mrs. NORTON. Does the gentleman not consider that New York is a protective State so far as children are concerned?

Mr. HARLAN. New York is the theatrical center, and it applies to New York citizens living in New York City. I do not say anything against the State of New York, but I do not want to be put off the train of thought right here. That is purely a side issue.

The report on this bill is very interesting and elucidating. Usually we criticize these reports, but this time I think we have a very good report. The report on the bill recommends it, first, because the theater patrons want the bill; second, because the theater owners want the bill; and third, because the parents of these children want the bill. The report is very careful not to state anything about whether the children are going to be benefited by the bill or not. I do not have the slightest wish to impugn the motives of the chairman of this committee in bringing out this bill, but there are some provisions in it to which I shall direct attention which I believe have not received her mature consideration.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LUCAS in the chair). Three hundred and twenty-six Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN] may resume.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as very few Members during the interim have shown that they understood just what is before the committee this afternoon, I shall briefly review the matter under discussion.

Under present conditions in the District of Columbia, boys under 14 and girls under 16 are not permitted to work after 7 o'clock in the evening, or something to that effect. Girls under 18 are not permitted to work after 10 o'clock at night. There are eight States that have a higher standard than this. There are approximately eight other States that I will not take time to name that have the same standard—Pennsylvania, Ohio, Massachusetts, and others. Now, if this bill is passed, all age restriction is going to be taken away from children working in the theaters in these traveling troups that go around the country. The District of Columbia will be at the lowest plane of all the States in the Union if this bill is passed. The bill here provides that no child shall work on the stage more than 4 hours in any one day, and he shall not work more than 28 hours in any one week. In other words, the provision is that a child cannot work more than 7 days in any one week.

The committee recommends the passage of this bill for three reasons. First, it says the theater owners want the bill; second, it says the theater patrons want the bill; and, third, it says that the parents want the bill. There it stops. It says very little about childhood being benefited by this bill. Oh, yes; the lady from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON] talks about the protection that is thrown around childhood. I do not want to impugn the motives or the background of the lady from New Jersey in this matter at all. She is just as much interested in childhood as anybody else, but the people who are back of this bill are not, and in my opinion they have imposed upon this committee.

Now, let us look at the protection they put around children. They cannot work more than 4 hours in 1 day on the stage. That means 240 minutes, which in a vaudeville performance would mean 10 turns of 24 minutes each. Two hundred and forty minutes a day. There is no leading lady, with a matinee and evening performance, who is actually on the stage any longer than that. That means 10 hours a day, at least, or more, waiting around the theater for this child to come on. Four hours a day on the stage. Ten turns of 24 minutes each. It would break any child.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARLAN. Not now. I cannot. I will yield as soon as I get through.

Now, they are going to have the police watch after this. What police force could go to all these little vaudeville houses to see that the children who perform there only work 4 hours in any one day? If that is any protection, we would have to have a policeman in every theater with a stop watch to check the number of minutes that the child was on the stage.

Five years ago, at the request of the District Committee, a commission was appointed to investigate child welfare in the District of Columbia. That commission made a report, and the one thing that was needed in this District, according to that report, was more police officers to look after the existing labor laws. If we do not have enough police officers to protect the laws as they are now, how are we going to proceed when we put in an absurd, unenforceable proceeding such as this?

Oh, the lady from New Jersey says they are going to have inspection of the plays by a representative of the Board of Education. In other words, the lady sets up another censorship on those plays. Now, what is that inspection? Twenty days before a play comes here a copy of the play is to be sent to the Board of Education. They are to look over that and 10 days later report whether the play is suitable or not. Green Pastures, which the lady states as the play she wanted here, was accepted in New York and all over this country as a fine, moral play. In London it was thrown out as highly immoral and irreligious. All of this means that the representative of the Board of Education——

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes; I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. Did the gentleman see Green Pastures?

Mr. HARLAN. I did.

Mrs. NORTON. What was the gentleman's opinion of it?

Mr. HARLAN. Very good. I saw it here, where children did not participate. They had dwarfs and other adults dressed as children that made a very good impression in the District of Columbia. I was very glad I saw it, but I was very glad I did not see children playing in the District of Columbia.

Mrs. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mrs. NORTON. I presume the gentleman was looking at that play with more or less prejudiced eyes. I saw it in New York, where children took part, and it was a beautiful performance, and I thought it did a great deal for children on the stage.

Mr. HARLAN. I am glad the lady saw it.

Now, this bill has been before every Congress since the Seventy-second Congress. When it was introduced 5 years ago the lady who represents the Board of Education and who will have this job of censoring these plays and looking after the children, testified before the Senate committee.

In answer to a question by Senator COPELAND:

Senator COPELAND. Then I take it you are not enthusiastic about it?

Miss Bentley replied:

No, sir; I am absolutely opposed to any effort to lower the standard of the District of Columbia child-labor laws.

From that same hearing I read also a portion of the statement by Miss Rhoda Milliken, lieutenant in charge of the women's bureau, police department of the District of Columbia. This question was asked her:

Senator COPELAND. I take it you are opposed to this measure?
Miss MILLIKEN. I think it would be very unfortunate, and I love the theater very dearly.

There is no human way of giving proper censorship to script for the reason that all kinds of dances can be put in and the child can be called upon to do a lot of acting. The general atmosphere of the play, entirely aside from the lines, can be highly immoral. No one can tell from the script what kind of play it is going to be.

The next thing to be considered is that this person from the District of Columbia is supposed to pass upon whether this child is being injured in any way by being on the stage, whether the education and physical condition of the child is being looked after. Here is a child in California coming to Washington. The Board of Education in Washington has 10 days to find out whether that child in California, with no fees, remember—oh, no, no; for this application and license no fees are to be charged! How can this representative in the District of Columbia find out whether a child's physical condition and educational requirements are being looked after?

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. Yes.

Mrs. NORTON. The gentleman mentioned 10 days. The time really is 21 days.

Mr. HARLAN. But the report has to be made within 10 days after the application. So there are only 10 days within which the representative of the District can function. The application is made 20 days before the performance, but the report has to be made 10 days after the application is filed. No provision is made for a medical examination of this child; no provision is made for any person trained in education to examine the child. There are no fees required—oh, no; no fees. Why, it would cost at least $50 per child to conduct this examination. No standard is set up. In other words, all these provisions that are supposed to be thrown in here to protect these children are just a lot of bunk. These theater promoters do not care any more for the welfare of these children than a hen does for toothbrushes. They are all thrown in to make the bill look good and as though it were really meant to protect childhood.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield.

Mr. RICH. If what the gentleman says is correct, does not the gentleman think the passage of this bill would lower standards of labor in this country? We ought to prohibit child labor.

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman is correct.

All the evidence we have on the question of children on the stage is that children working in theaters are injured in some way or other. A short time ago at the White House there was a conference of the welfare workers of the country. They unanimously stated that work on the stage was injurious to children. I have not time now to read the report, but I will include it in my remarks.

Then again every commission in the United States that has investigated this question has reported that work on the stage was injurious to children. I will read you the findings of some of them. The Children's Aid Society of Buffalo examined 76 children over a period of 7 years, and makes this report:

While this group of stage children applying to our society for permits are mentally normal, we found evidence of nervous strain to which these children are subject. This is the most serious condition we have to contend with in modern times relative to stage children.

At Cincinnati, Ohio, a survey was made. Questionnaires were sent not only to Ohio but throughout the country, and the findings were that 80 percent of the children were from 1 to 6 years retarded in school and study, for children traveling cannot possibly keep up with their school work as does a child attending a regular school.

There is not a bit of evidence any place showing that theater work does not injure children. It is certainly true that insufficient surveys have been made of the effect of a theatrical life on childhood. The report of the recent White House conference, nevertheless, says:

Employment on the stage involves night work, travel, prolonged rehearsals, nervous strain associated with appearing before the public—all combining to make it work which would seem to be particularly unsuited to immature minds and bodies.

There seems to be no reason why the standards for the employment of children in theatrical productions of all kinds should not be as high in regard to minimum age, education, and the necessity of procuring employment certificates as for other occupations.

There are a few cases of exceptional children, geniuses, where a special tutor and a doctor actually go along with the child. Such children do not suffer so much injury, but still they suffer some.

The great majority of children who will be exploited if this bill goes into effect, with nobody to protect them, no inspection, no money provided for inspection, no means of inspection if there were money, will be injured as every report says they have been.

There is no need for this. Oh, it is said, you give the children an opportunity to bud forth in their genius. In 1895, Mr. Speaker, a survey was made in New York of all the children on the stage in that city. There were 320 of them, I believe, at that time. In 1910, 15 years later, an editor of Who's Who in the Theater revealed that of these 320 children, only 1 had reached any prominence and only 5 were still on the stage. These "budding geniuses", Mr. Speaker, are children. They are just like bear cubs in the zoo. Young life is always interesting; it has a drawing power; adults like to see it; but that is all there is to it; and all over this country now children's theaters are being developed where children can play. Some of the better-known theaters are:

Boston: Emerson Children's Theater.
New York: King-Coit School, Neighborhood Playhouse, Children's Theater of the Greenwich House Theater Association.
Peekskill: Children's Playhouse.
Columbus: Children's Playhouse.
Chicago: Junior League Children's Theater.
(Fifteen other junior leagues have some form of children's theater.)
Chicago: Hull House.
Tulsa: Children's Theater.

Columbia, S. C.: Town Theater Scalawags.
Los Angeles: Children's Theater Guild.
Duluth: Children's Department of the Little Theater and Junior League.
Denver: Junior League Players.
Minneapolis: Junior Repertory Theater.
Bloomington: Wesleyan Children's Theater.

Fifty years ago lawyers learned their profession by running around with a country lawyer; doctors did the same thing, young doctors followed some older doctor and learned the business. Fifty years ago men of the stage learned their profession that way. But today a far better system of education is springing up in all the professions, and this includes the theater as well. Of the prominent actors now on the stage practically none of them started out under 16 years of age, and most of them were 20.

I will give you a list of those: Of 271 well-known modern actors and actresses, 202 began their stage careers after 14 years of age, 170 after 16 years of age, 9 after 18 years of age, 3 after 19, 6 after 20, and 16 after 21. Of those in the last class, we find such names as John Barrymore, Blanche Bates, Mrs. Leslie Carter, Henry B. Irving, James Hackett Lillie Langtry, Richard Mansfield, Robert Mantell.

These individuals managed to achieve preeminence in their professions after having lived a normal childhood and after receiving a proper basic education.

The actors and actresses of this country are not developed by traveling around the country when they are children and being deprived of their proper nourishment, jerked out of bed at all hours of the day and night, and fed at all times, and otherwise deprived of childhood plays and the normal things that they should do as children. That is not the way to make actors and actresses, but you do make money that way, and that is what is back of this measure.

When this bill was up for consideration in the Seventy-second Congress there was an advertisement which appeared in the Washington papers placed by a musical comedy company which was coming to Washington, reading as follows:

Guaranteed that 25 of the girls appearing in this show are under 16 years of age.

That is what they want to do with a bill of this kind. It is the managers and promoters who want to exploit young girls and the childhood of this country, because they know people will go to the theater to see children perform. They know that men like to look at very young girls. Of course, the advertisement was a lie, but the fact that the advertisement appeared in the Washington papers shows what they have in mind by this kind of a bill.

A statement has been made here that labor is back of this bill. The sign painters' union did endorse the bill a few years ago, as well as the theater musicians, but the teachers' union very vehemently opposed the bill, and through them I communicated with Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor. Let me read what he said on this subject:

The American Federation of Labor has not given its approval to this proposed legislation, and, in my opinion, we will not extend to it official approval. We are concerned in the principles of child-labor legislation and the establishment of standards for the protection of children. I will be glad to give this matter to which you call my attention careful personal consideration. The traditional policy of the American Federation of Labor toward child-labor legislation will be maintained.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Does the gentleman maintain for a moment that Mr. Green in the correspondence which the gentleman just read disapproved of the bill? He just does not place the stamp of affirmative approval on it until further consideration may be given to the matter, but he does not disapprove.

Mr. HARLAN. I quoted what he said. The sign painters' union or the scenery painters' union advocated this measure. Mr. Green certainly expresses his personal disapproval of it.

Mr. DIRKSEN. But the disapproval is not contained in the correspondence which the gentleman has just presented to the House.

Mr. RICH. How could Mr. Green or anyone else opposed to child labor support a measure of this sort?

Mr. HARLAN. They could not.

Mr. RICH. How could they approve a bill which permits child labor in the District of Columbia when they do not want child labor used in the State of Pennsylvania and the other four States to which the gentleman referred?

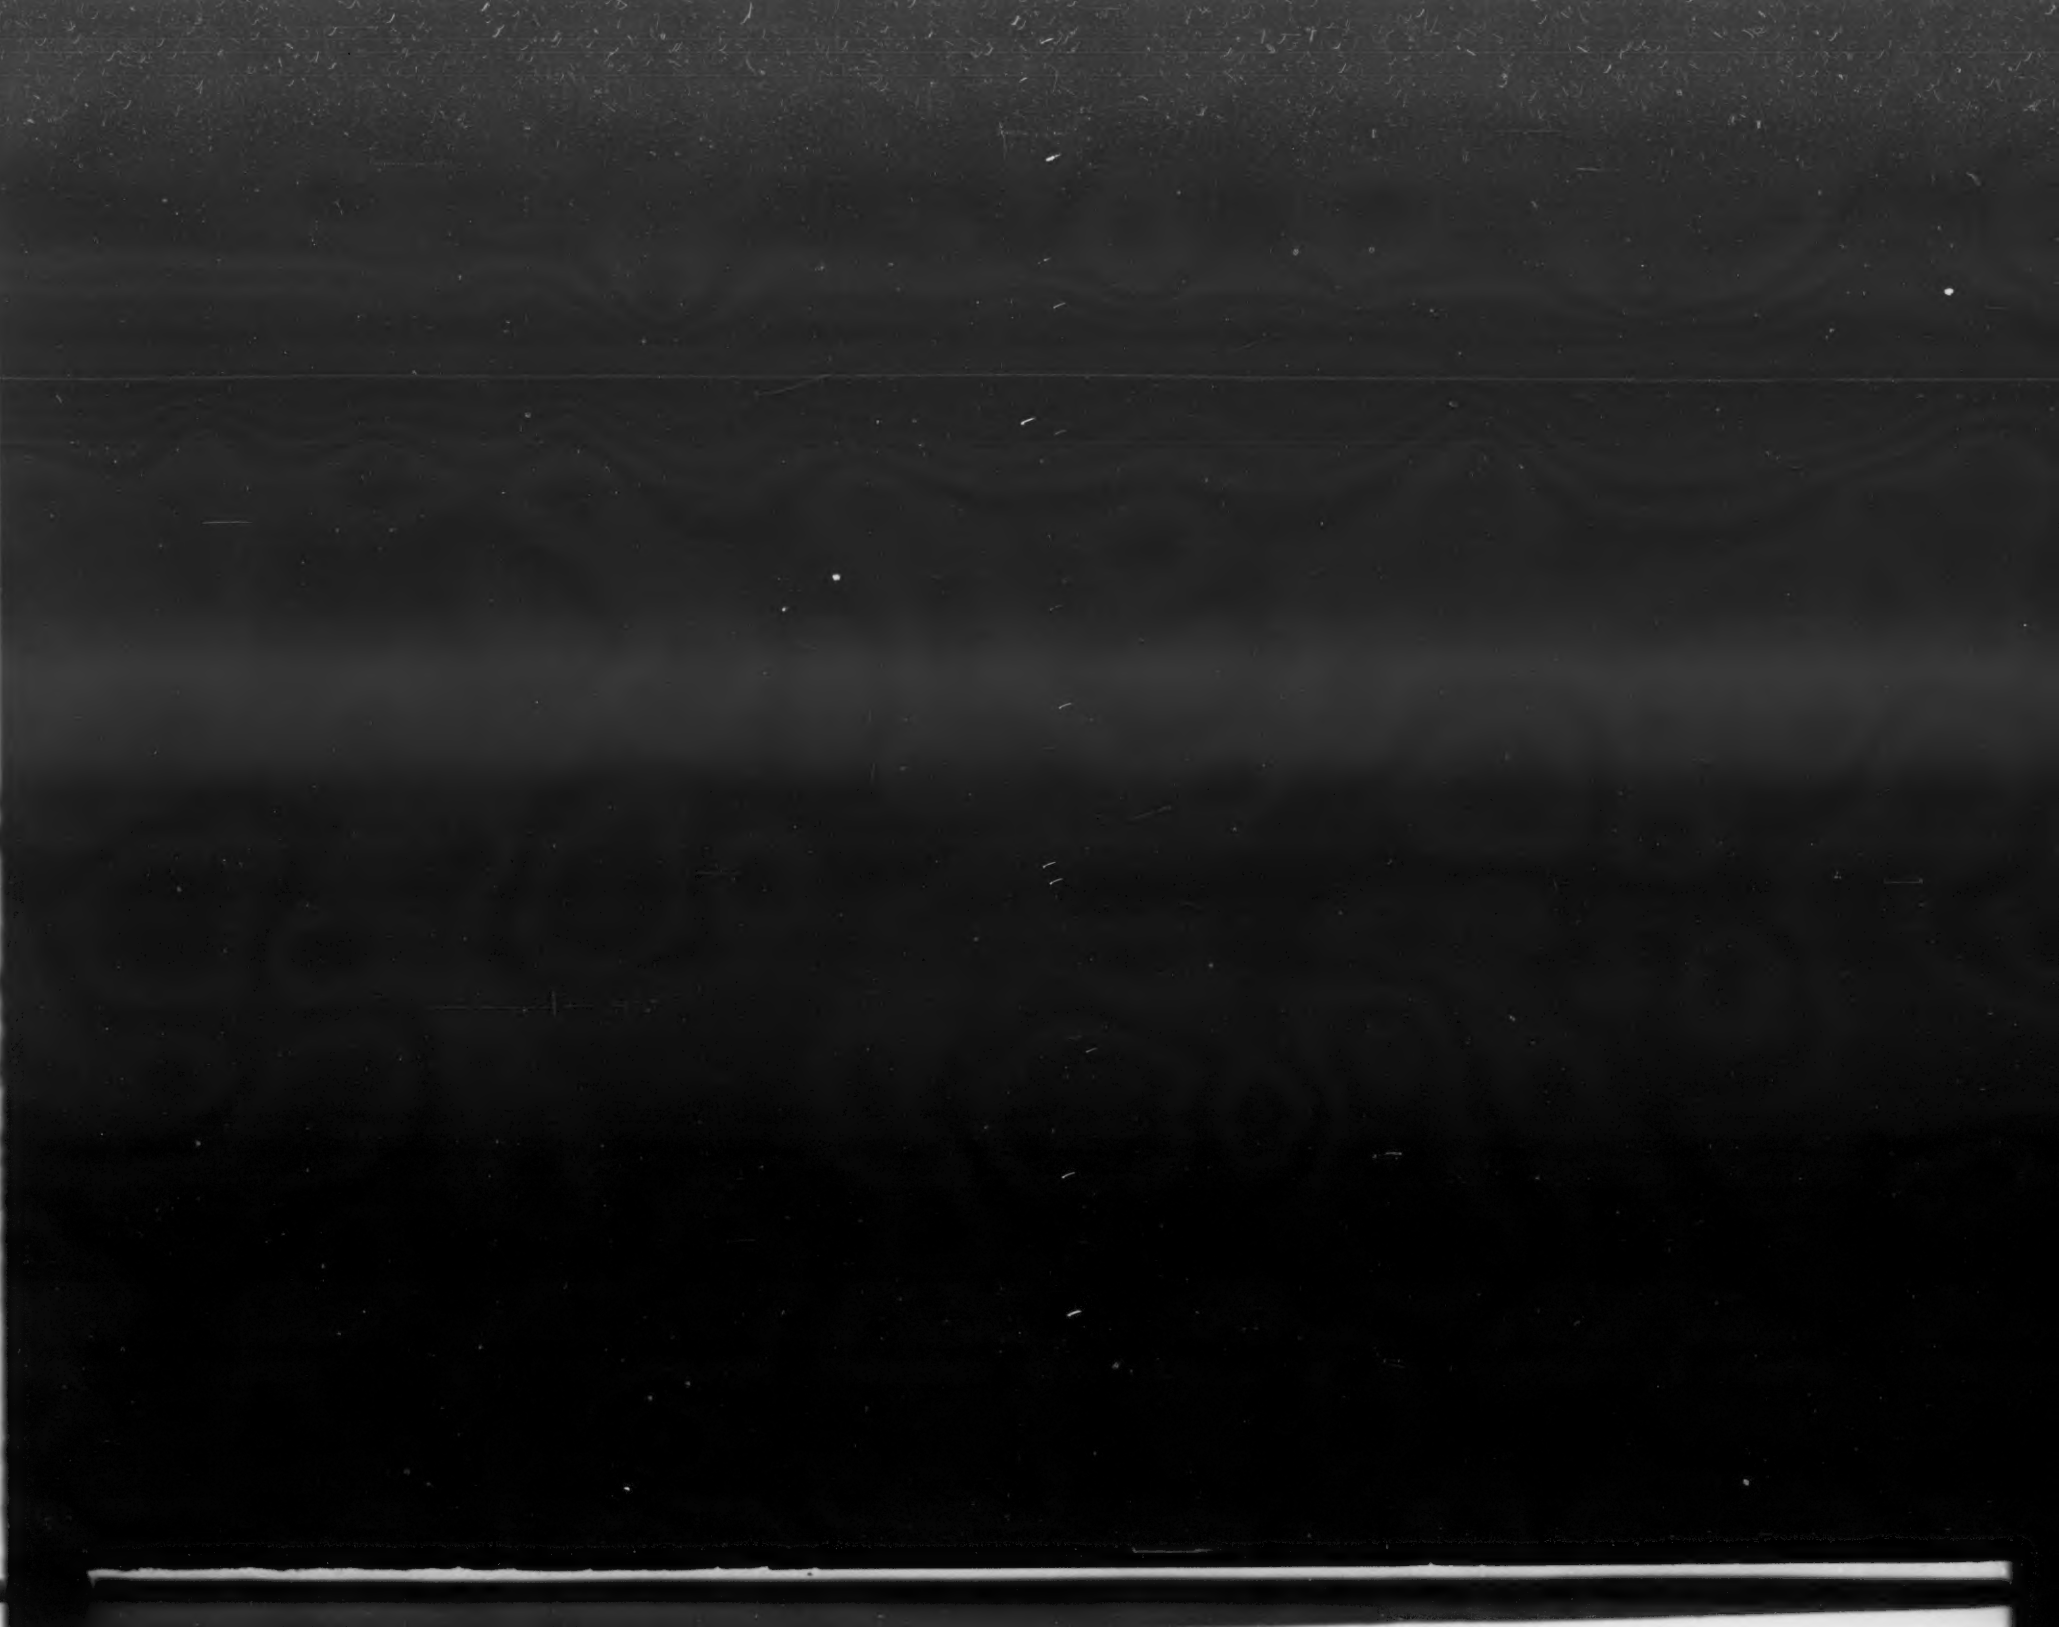
Mr. HARLAN. There is no more reason for lowering the bars against child labor here and making the District of Columbia the lowest point in our civilization in this regard than allowing children to work in the cranberry marshes of New Jersey or in the coal mines of Ohio. All of the things which allow children to grow and develop are taken away from them by this bill, and it does not make any difference whether it involves the sweatshops or the fields or wherever you work them. Childhood is childhood, and they ought to be given a chance to develop as children.

Mr. WOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARLAN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WOOD. It is a fact that the history of the American Federation of Labor during the past 25 or 30 years has been one unalterably opposed to child labor?

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman is correct.



Mr. WOOD. It, therefore, goes without saying that President Green simply reiterated the policy of the American Federation of Labor so far as concerns child labor. The American Federation of Labor and various philanthropic organizations in the States that have passed similar laws have bitterly opposed the legislation, but it has been enacted over their bitter protests.

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman is correct. That is the situation, and that is why there is all this material about an examination and similar bunk in this bill. After this bill is enacted into law, then there will be an agitation in your State and in my State to pass measures of this kind in all cases where children have been licensed by the Board of Education in the District of Columbia to appear on the stage. The people in your State and in my State will think, of course, that there has been a real examination, and the children thus licensed shall be authorized to appear in every State that is involved.

Mr. Speaker, this is simply a wedge to break down the protection of children and also a wedge to be used to pry under the child-labor laws in other lines of work.

The gentlewoman from New Jersey referred to two pastors who have kindly endorsed this bill. I do not know whether in the theological seminaries they teach child-protection and welfare or not, and I do not know how many pastors have been consulted, with reference to this matter, in order to determine how many others may be against the bill. I do know, however, that every organization in this country with which I have come in contact, and I have been in contact with these organizations for 25 years, is against such laws as this bill would enact into law. Taking the District of Columbia here, may I read the names of some of the organizations which have passed resolution of very bitter disapproval against this measure:

The American Humane Association.
The American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children.
Voteless District League of Women Voters.
Women's Council of the Federation of Churches.
Child Welfare Committee of the Council of Social Agencies.

And so on down the line. Name the welfare organization and I will tell you it is against this bill. The only groups backing this bill are those directly or indirectly anticipating a profit from its enactment or under political pressure from some such organization. Just analyze the list which has been read and will be read. This does not apply to individual endorsements. There is nobody outside of the three groups named in this report; first, the theater owners; second, the theater patrons; and, third, the exploiting parents of some of these children who want to make money out of their own children. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

EMPLOYMENT OF MINORS

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, with all due deference to my distinguished friend from Ohio, I think he dealt with so many generalities that the bill pending before the House today is more obscure now than it was when we started its consideration about an hour ago, and for the purpose of simply clarifying the issue in your mind, I ask your patient indulgence for about 5 minutes.

In May of 1928 Congress put legislation on the books which so limited the hours within which children could be employed in the District of Columbia that no professional presentation that comes to one of the stages of the city here can come within this limitation, and as a result it operates so restrictively upon some of the finer dramatic productions that they cannot come to the city of Washington.

To remedy this situation we have introduced this bill, called a bill for the employment of minors, and here is what it provides: It provides that when application has been made to the Board of Education 21 days before, and permission has been granted, then they can employ juveniles upon the stage not to exceed 4 hours in any 1 day for not to exceed, of course, 7 days in the week, making a maximum total of 28 hours in the week.

Now, the only purpose of this measure is to relent the restriction that obtains at the present time and to let some of the finer dramatic productions come to Washington. You cannot play Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm at the present time if it has any juvenile parts, because you cannot put the juveniles on the stage and keep them there under existing law, and I submit to you, after the dramatic discourse of my friend from Ohio, if we do not relent and if we apply to the stage and to the country generally the philosophy of the theater that the gentleman from Ohio has in mind, all the playwrights everywhere can stop right now trying to put juveniles in any dramatic production.

You cannot play the Return of Peter Grimm on the stage here. You cannot play Daddy Longlegs on the stage. You could not play Shirley Temple in Washington today, and I doubt whether some of these delightful and intriguing children who have beguiled the hearts of the adults and the children from the silver screen in every village, hamlet, and city in the country could have been produced. Children have an essential place in the drama no less than have adults.

The residents here want some of these benefits to come to the city of Washington, and this can be done only if we relax some of the restrictions that obtain at the present time.

The churches of the country today are doing what? They are united in a grand crusade against obscenity in the theater. The Catholic and the Protestant and the Jewish faiths are all united in this crusade from one coast to the other, and I submit that the best way to run obscenity out of the theater is to bring in some of these sweet productions that intrigue the minds of people, that appeal to young and to old alike. Yet they cannot have them in Washington today because the labor law is against it, and all that this bill seeks to do is to so ease this restriction, under proper regulations that these better productions can come here for the edification of the folks living in Washington.

I do not yield to the gentleman from Ohio or anybody else in my solicitude for children. I wish to see restrictions retained that are meant to safeguard children against improper inroads and to preserve intact the gains that have been made in the great fight for child welfare and against exploitation of child labor. I do not wish any of these restrictions broken down. But this is not exploitation; it is but permitting the legitimate use of child talent.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Not now.

The gentleman from Ohio read a lot of endorsements of people who are opposed to the legislation. Let me read you a few who are in favor of it. For instance, the proposed amendment is endorsed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the Chamber of Commerce, the law committee of the Washington Board of Trade, the Merchants and Manufacturers Association, the Northeast Washington Citizens' Association, the Petworth Citizens' Association, the Musicians' Protective Union, and by the Central Labor Union of the city of Washington. They have just as much interest in protecting the children of this city as myself or my friend from Ohio or anybody else, and they have endorsed this legislation, if you please.

It seems to me, therefore, that it requires nothing more to clarify the standpoint of local labor at least than to say that the Central Labor Union of the city of Washington has endorsed it.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HARLAN. With the exception of the Central Labor Union, every one that has endorsed this bill has been a group that will profit by the increased business that will accrue to the theaters growing out of the proposed legislation.

Mr. DIRKSEN. What more do you need than the Central Labor body that represents all the different elements of organized labor in Washington?

Mr. HARLAN. Has the teachers' union endorsed this bill?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I do not necessarily follow the teachers in a matter that pertains to the theater. You will agree that the theater is a great cultural force in this country; and you take the stand, of course, that playwrights will have to change technique and keep juveniles out of their scripts and thereby fail to place a realistic interpretation of life; and you thereby throw a wet blanket upon the legitimate theater as a great cultural force in our country.

Of course, I am not going to follow such a judgment, and I believe this bill ought to be passed by the House today, if you please; and, finally, let me submit that the kindly and benign gentleman who prayed for our salvation and for the destiny of this body this morning has given you his unequivocal endorsement of this bill, the Reverend James Shera Montgomery. Still another to endorse the bill is Rabbi Abram Simon, who says:

I am thoroughly in sympathy with any amendment of the restriction that shall give to childhood an opportunity for cultivation of the dramatic art, provided this can be done without any injury whatsoever to our children. I would trust the judgment of our Board of Education absolutely.

Then, finally, the statement of the Reverend Francis J. Hurney, a man of the cloth, who did a great deal to encourage amateur dramatics in the District of Columbia. He states that if the present law had been in force when he was teaching the dramatic and thespian art to lots of children, some of whom have found their way onto the professional stage—if the law of 1928 had obtained when he was doing his great work he could not have sent any of them out into the world to engage in work on the stage and could not have carried on a lot of his amateur theatricals here.

In conclusion, let me say we ought to exercise common sense and take this silly restrictive law off the statute books right now. [Applause.]

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, as long as this bill is up, I should like to ask if anybody on the majority side is doing anything to further a child-labor-law amendment.

Mrs. O'DAY. I am.

Mr. FISH. What progress are you making?

Mrs. O'DAY. We still have 12 States to ratify the amendment. In the meantime we are opposed to letting down the bars.

Mr. FISH. What States are those?

Mrs. O'DAY. I can tell the gentleman in a minute. I have them here.

Mr. FISH. The lady can put them in the RECORD. Let me say this in regard to the pending amendment: The President on many occasions has pointed out to the public that when the N. R. A. was declared unconstitutional it wiped out the child-labor law, and the inference was that there were no State labor laws; whereas most States have child-labor laws and have had long before the N. R. A.

Mr. McFARLANE. What position does your candidate take on the question?

Mr. FISH. We are for child-labor laws. I am pointing out that there are only a few States which have no child-labor laws, and that those are mainly Democratic States of the South. The next time the President speaks on that matter, I hope he will make that plain to the public.

Mr. McFARLANE. If the gentleman will come down South, we will educate him to the fact that there are child-labor laws in the South.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I was much interested in the statement made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN] in reference to the fact that there were four States that had stringent child-labor laws, among them Pennsylvania; that Pennsylvania's laws were more stringent than those of the District of Columbia. I want to say to the Members of Congress that if you are going to make laws prohibiting child labor, why reduce the standard in the District of Columbia? If anyone, especially a manufacturer, should come into the State of Pennsylvania and propose to reduce the age limit in the child-labor laws of Pennsylvania, they would rise up in holy horror. I say that we are for child-labor laws in Pennsylvania and opposed to this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman tell us his views on the child-labor question?

Mr. RICH. Always we have supported the child-labor laws, and we are opposed to have children labor in our manufacturing plants and in the whole Nation. That is what I stand for.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Missouri 2 minutes.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to say anything on this bill, but so much has been said about the position of the different organizations of the District that I feel called upon to say a few words. The real force and effect of this bill has not been touched upon. Everyone who has spoken in favor of the bill has said that it would allow one to work children under 18 and 16 years of age not more than 4 hours a day, or not more than 28 hours a week, but they did not say that there were any safeguards surrounding this piece of legislation which would prohibit a theatrical manager or owner placing a boy or girl on at 1 minute after 12 o'clock noon and working that boy or girl until 11 o'clock that night. There may be four or five or six performances, and the only time it would be considered the child is working would be when the child is actually performing on the stage. So that it would be possible to work the child 10 or 11 hours a day. Then take the road shows that are coming into Washington and into other large cities in the United States. They lack a great deal of being conducive to good morals for the children or adults. I refer to these burlesque shows and the musical comedies. I should like to know how the Board of Education of the city of Washington could in any way investigate just exactly what has been done before the road shows come to Washington with respect to protecting the morals of the child or taking care of its education. There is no way it can find out. As has been well said, there are no fees allowed for any examination or research by the Board of Education.

The natural consequence will be that the Board of Education will not be particular as to whether these children coming here in these road shows are treated properly or not. It is generally understood that all philanthropic societies like the League of Women Voters and the Federation of Women's Clubs and nearly all these State and National women's societies, as well as the American Federation of Labor and numerous other organizations, have been fighting against the scourge of child labor for 25 or 30 years, and in those States where they have taken off the ban, like my own State of Missouri and elsewhere, that ban has not been taken off because labor or the philanthropic societies agree to it, but it was taken off over our bitter protest. I think it would be dangerous at this time to lift the ban and tamper in any way with the child-labor laws of the District of Columbia or of any State in the Union. I hope this bill will not pass.

Never has there been a more tragic picture than the condition of the theatrical fraternity in the last 12 or 15 years, since the advent of the moving picture and the advent of the sound picture, when thousands and thousands of arists have virtually starved, thousands having been compelled to walk the streets and join the bread line because modern invention has put them out of employment; and I should like to know where this great opportunity of employment will be for these children that travel with these road shows that they say are getting theatrical education in the arts.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we have lost sight of the principle involved in this bill. We have gone very far in classing it a labor bill. This is not a labor bill in any sense. It is simply a bill to give the District of Columbia permission to allow children to perform on the stage. So much has been said regarding the health of children. Does it not seem reasonable to believe that no producer would want or allow a child to act who was not in good physical condition? The child would not be of any use to him. I have been told by the theater managers here in Washington that the bill would probably not involve more than about 2 dozen children in a whole year. It merely permits them to appear in plays where children are necessary, and certainly nobody would question that Shirley Temple has been of real value by her exceptional performances. If they had a law in California such as exists in the District of Columbia, we would all be deprived of the pleasure of that child's acting. Maude Adams is another who started her career on the stage at a very young age. As I said in my original statement today, no Member of this House would go further to protect children than I. I would not lend myself to a measure of this kind if I thought it would do any child the least bit of harm. As I stated previously, I have devoted a great many years of my life to child-welfare work. Do you think it likely that I would come before this House and ask you to pass a bill that could in any possible way be detrimental to children? I assure you we are not letting down the bars on child labor. If and when the child-labor amendment comes before this House nobody will work for it more earnestly than I. There is a great difference between child-labor problems and merely permitting children to act on the stage under the safeguards provided in this bill. This is not a child-labor problem in any sense. Permit me to repeat what this bill provides for: The application for a permit must be submitted to the Board of Education 21 days in advance and a copy of the manuscript of the play in which the minor is to appear must accompany the application. Does anybody believe that the Board of Education would approve any manuscript involving a child character that it did not think was perfectly fit?

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. NORTON. No; I refuse to yield now.

The Board may issue such permit when it determines that the child is receiving adequate educational instructions and that the health and morals of the minor are properly safeguarded.

Then, again, the amendment is endorsed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, by the Chamber of Commerce, by the law committee of the Washington Board of Trade, by the Merchants and Manufacturers Association, the Northeast Washington Citizens Association, the Petworth Citizens Association, the Musicians Protective Union, the president of the District Bar Association, Central Labor Union, and many others.

I am positive that none of these people and organizations would lend themselves to doing anything that would harm the children of the District. So I sincerely hope you will not confuse the issue involved in this bill.

There has been a great deal of discussion that does not in any sense apply to the bill. It merely provides the District of Columbia with the same rules and regulations that many of you in your own States are now enjoying with regard to children in theatrical productions.

I move the previous question on the bill, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I still have 2 minutes remaining under my agreement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The gentleman has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the lady from New York [Mrs. O'DAY].

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to speak against a bill that has the endorsement of my colleague from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON], but I feel that she, together with the reverend gentlemen and various other outstanding citizens who are for this amendment, has not taken into consideration the children not in the District of Columbia. Of course, those in the city of Washington will be safeguarded, but how can the Board of Education of the District of Columbia know what safeguards are around those same children when they leave Washington and go on to the next 1-night stand? Undoubtedly this amendment, if it passes, will weaken tremendously the chances of an early passage of a Federal amendment against child labor. Every organization that I know of, every welfare organization is against this amendment. When practically the same amendment was introduced in 1932 it was opposed by 19 organizations in the city of Washington, 4 of them national organizations.

A commission for the unification of laws throughout the United States has cited theatrical employment as being a hazardous occupation and has fixed a minimum age of 16.

It is a very difficult thing for me to rise in opposition to this bill because it has the endorsement of one of the finest, most outstanding women of this country, MARY NORTON. We know she has a heart so big, so warm, that it goes out in love to every child with whom she comes in contact. It was her love for children and her invaluable services in behalf of the underprivileged children of her own State that drew her into the field of politics, and in that field she has won the affection and admiration of all who have followed her career.

She and I have talked this bill over. She points out to me that it has the endorsement of our own Chaplain and of other clergymen of the city; that the children would be safeguarded by the provision that a copy of the manuscript of a play must be furnished to the Board of Education 21 days before the proposed appearance of the child and must meet with the Board's approval.

That it is unfair for the citizens of Washington to be deprived of seeing plays that are given in other States and cities whose laws regulating the employment of children in theatrical productions are less stringent than those of Washington.

As to this last—it has been possible under the present law to produce successfully in Washington plays calling for children in the cast.

As Thousands Cheer; The Good Earth; Ah, Wilderness; and others, including Green Pastures; and from the theatergoers' point of view these plays were highly successful.

As to safeguards surrounding the children, we know that every effort would be made by Washington's Board of Education to protect them from anything harmful to their morals and health. Nevertheless, when in 1932 an attempt was made to amend the present law by the introduction of a practically similar bill, it was opposed by most of the welfare organizations of the District. I have here a list of 19—4 of them national organizations, including the Child Labor Committee of the White House Conference on Child Health and Protection.

The uniform child labor law adopted by the Conference of Commissioners on Uniform State Laws in 1930 lists employment in theaters among hazardous occupations and fixes 16 as a minimum for such work.

The wording of this amendment throws open to children of any age employment in vaudeville, variety shows, and revues. Some of these are clean and very beautiful, but the best of them would involve travel, stays in hotels and boarding houses that would deprive a child of the normal life and uninterrupted schooling to which he is entitled.

As to the worst of them, I have seen some where children were employed, and it was heart-breaking to contemplate what the future held for them.

Washington is our national seat of Government; it sets an example for the rest of the country. Congress is its legislative body, and the passage of this amendment would go far toward breaking down the laws pertaining to child labor that have been so painstakingly built up by most of our States. When N. R. A. was launched its bitterest opponents conceded that it had two good points—the abolition of child labor and sweatshops.

Yesterday's papers carried a statement of William Green that there—

> Has been a wholesale resumption of child labor since the Supreme Court's N. R. A. decision. As soon as the power of this act was nullified industry again made overtures to children. Children responded because their parents were without jobs or because the family income was so low that every additional pittance provided more of the necessities of life.

The Child Labor Committee makes a similar report. That committee, the Federation of Labor, and countless other organizations are working in behalf of Federal amendment for the regulation of child labor. Twenty-four States have ratified it; 12 more are needed.

When the measure first came up before the States for ratification a terrific campaign of opposition was launched by the National Association of Manufacturers, according to its own admission.

A campaign against it still wages.

Will the Capital City of Washington support that campaign by throwing the weight of its great influence against those who are striving to protect America's children from exploitation and the evils of child labor?

If this amendment is adopted, it will retard to an untold degree the progress that we have made toward the protection and welfare of our country's children.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Speaker, there are some new Members in this body and I am one of them. I desire to ask a question of the chairman of this particular committee in order to get a little information about the particular bill now before the House for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the bill is about to be read under the 5-minute rule, and the gentleman will have opportunity when the first section is read.

Mr. CURLEY. I simply wished to inquire from the chairman of the committee whether or not she would yield for two questions so that we might be able to get this information.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of Congress entitled "An act to regulate the employment of minors within the District of Columbia", approved May 29, 1928, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding after section 7 a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 7a. Notwithstanding the provisions of this act, the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, or a duly authorized agent thereof, is authorized to issue a work permit to any female person under 18 years of age and to any male person under 16 years of age, said permit authorizing and permitting the appearance of such person on the stage of a duly licensed theater within the District of Columbia, in any professional traveling theatrical production not considered offensive to public decency: Provided, That such person shall not appear on said stage after the hour of 11 o'clock in the evening of any day, nor more than 4 hours in 1 day, nor more than 28 hours in 1 week. Application for such permit shall be made by the parent or guardian of such minor to the Board of Education of the District of Columbia, or a duly authorized agent thereof, at least 21 days in advance of the scheduled theatrical performance, and with such application there shall be furnished a copy of the manuscript of the play, and the Board of Education shall advise the applicant of the granting or refusal of such permit within 10 days thereafter. The Board or its agent may issue a permit when satisfied that the minor is receiving adequate educational instructions and that the health and morals of the minor are properly safeguarded."

With the following committee amendments:

On page 2, line 4, after the word "person", insert "in a musical recital or concert, or."

Page 2, line 16, after the word "of", insert "the program of the recital or concert or of."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York desire recognition?

Mr. CURLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARLAN] has explained the point I had in mind. I simply desired to know whether the children mentioned by the chairman of the committee in her remarks were children who had had special training in their work, and whether those were the only ones included in connection with the child-welfare legislation. That is all I wanted to ask.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to proceed out of order for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Not on this subject.

Mr. DIRKSEN. May we not finish this bill first?

Mrs. NORTON. I shall be glad to yield the gentleman time later, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to object until we have finished action on this bill. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Nothing in this act shall be construed as amending, altering, or repealing the provisions of section 7 of the act of May 29, 1928.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HARLAN) there were ayes 27 and noes 76.

Mrs. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote and make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 70, nays 227, not voting 133, as follows:

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I wish to address myself briefly and mainly to the Republican representation in the House. I do not know that what I shall say will be a delight to their ears, but I hope it will penetrate their souls, because it comes from a very responsible source.

The other day, when the announcement was made in this House that the Supreme Court had ruled out the A. A. A., the announcement was met with joy, exaltation, and handclapping on the part of the Republican membership. I have a brief letter from a friend of mine, a Republican official in the county of Cambria, a judge of the common-pleas court of that county, a lifelong Republican, a man who has at different times held important office by election on the Republican ticket, expressing his views in regard to that decision. He wrote me the following letter:

EBENSBURG, PA., January 8, 1936.

HON. JOSEPH GRAY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JOSEPH: New Year's greetings to yourself and family.

You certainly are in the midst of exciting times down there, and inter nos, had I been a member of the Supreme Court I think I should have been found with the minority Justices. I am having a good many quiet laughs over the frenzied effort to drag the dear old Constitution out into the open as a desperate attempt to head off the constructive work sought to be brought about by the present administration.

Of course, there have been mistakes made due in large part to the innate weakness of human instrumentality, but in my opinion the effort in general on the part of Congress and the President to extricate us from the present national bog is praiseworthy and deserves all the support that it is possible to give it. I fear the old biblical adage that it is the letter of the law that killeth, but the spirit that maketh alive is finding illustration in the decisions of the Supreme Court. This may be heresy on the part of a Republican; but if it be heresy, make the most of it.

I am, with great regard,
Yours very sincerely,

CHARLES C. GREER.

I wish you gentlemen on the Republican side please to bear in mind that here is a very eminent citizen, a distinguished judge of the State of Pennsylvania, an able lawyer, a very fine character, a noble man, broad-minded, open-minded, who is showing his reaction which I hope will have some beneficial effect on those who applauded so joyously the decision of the Supreme Court but who are going to find their joy turned to sadness.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman tell us whether the writer of this letter is a police court judge or a common-pleas judge, and what is his name?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I gave that information. He is a judge of the court of common pleas in Cambria County and has been for some years. His name is Charles C. Greer, and he is a resident of Johnstown. Is there anything else?

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG. Do I understand from the gentleman that this distinguished jurist from his State is a member of the Grand Old Party, of which the gentleman and I are not members?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Decidedly so, and he always has been.

Mr. HOFFMAN and Mr. FISH rose.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield first to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Can the gentleman tell us what the former candidate for the Presidency, Al Smith, thinks of that decision, or the attitude toward it of ex-Governor Ritchie or Newton D. Baker or John W. Davis?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. No; I have no information as to that, and I do not care. Every man is entitled to his views, however eminent and however reactionary. I have given those of a lifelong, strong-hearted Republican judge, whose patriotism is greater than his partisanship.

Mr. McFARLANE. It seems that this judge had a lucid interval.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Lucid intervals are a habit with my esteemed friend, Judge Greer.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, the most important problem that confronts America today is the crisis resulting from the nullification of the farm program.

The farmer is the cornerstone of whatever measure of prosperity we have attained. Remove the cornerstone and the superstructure that is built thereon will fall.

It is possible that the farm prices will remain at the present level for a time. It is even possible that they will advance some due to the immediate removal of the processing tax, but ultimately production will increase and prices will fall, carrying down with them the farmer. When the farmer goes down the merchant goes down. When the merchant goes down the manufacturer goes down. When the manufacturer goes down the wage earners start hitchhiking, and we are right back where we started, at the bottom of the depression.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEE of Oklahoma. I decline to yield.

Mr. Speaker, for 150 years the farmers have been selling on a world market and buying on a protected market. This disadvantage has been partly offset by the newness of our country and by the continual increase in population, and yet for 150 years, under this unsound economic system, we have had periodic depressions. We have solved these depressions by opening up new frontiers and draining off the disinherited. But when this last depression came there were no new frontiers. We had settled up to the west coast and met ourselves coming back.

The gradual disadvantage under which the farmer has labored once more overtook him. The disparity between the price of raw materials and manufactured articles gradually increased. What the farmer bought cost more; what he sold brought less. He increased his output in order to make up for its diminished value. But he fell a victim of his own labor. The more he produced the less it would buy. Finally he reached the point where his whole crop would not sell for enough cash to pay his taxes. He stopped buying; he had to.

When the farmer stopped buying the merchant stopped selling. When the merchant stopped selling, the factory wheels stopped turning. When the factory wheels stopped turning, the wage earners started hitchhiking, and the depression was on.

When the Government undertook to restore prosperity it began at the source of the trouble; it began by restoring the lost buying power of the farmer, the logical place to begin recovery. The economists can spin all of the fine theories they wish about the depression, but you cannot have good times unless you get money into the hands of the farmers. Mr. Hoover tried to bring about recovery by setting up the R. F. C. and loaning money to the banks and railroads and factories, but you cannot make a nation prosperous by pouring money in at the top. You have got to get the grease where the screak is. It was not loans that the factories needed; it was customers.

But Mr. Roosevelt undertook to bring about prosperity by getting buying power in the hands of the farmers, because they constitute one of the largest groups of the consuming public.

For 150 years we have been operating under the unsound economic policy of allowing the law of supply and demand to operate naturally so far as agriculture was concerned, but artificially controlling it so far as industry was concerned.

Therefore the Government was confronted with the proposition of either removing the tariff walls and allowing the law of supply and demand to operate naturally, on manufacturer as well as farmer, or else give the farmer a tariff that would artificially stimulate his prices. The latter was decided upon.

It was then that the A. A. A. was set up. Government checks began going out to the country. Money, the lifeblood of prosperity, began flowing out to the forks of the creek. Cash began reaching the "grass roots." Farm prices doubled. Then they tripled; then they quadrupled. And finally they increased five times; thereby increasing five times the purchasing power of the millions of people engaged in agriculture. This money began finding its way to town, to the clothing stores, to the shoe stores, to the harness shops, to the hardware stores, to the lumber yards; and in turn it flowed on back to the factories, and the factory wheels started humming and the laborers started back to work.

From that date carloadings have increased each month. The general graph of business has been steadily upward. The Nation's income has increased over $5,000,000,000, and there is at present every indication of a return to substantial, healthy prosperity.

Then comes the decision of the Supreme Court nullifying the farm program, which is the foundation of this recovery; thereby bringing about a national crisis. The farm leaders from over the Nation realize this, and have met here in Washington, and with a unanimity never before attained, have recommended that Congress pass legislation that will effectively take the place of the A. A. A. program.

Their recommendation follows somewhat the domestic-allotment plan and emphasizes soil conservation.

I believe, with the unanimous cooperation of the farm leaders, a program along these lines can be worked out that will maintain fair prices for farm commodities, and at the same time meet the requirements of constitutionality.

Three years ago the Government was blazing a new trail, but now we have the advantage of 3 years of experience, giving us much useful information.

From this vantage point of experience, it is my hope that we can write a better and a more permanent farm program than we had before, and thus place agriculture on a parity with industry, where farm and factory will share alike in the new prosperity that such a program will guarantee to America.

AMENDMENT OF HAWAIIAN ORGANIC ACT

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 8284) to amend the Hawaiian organic act may be recommitted to the Committee on the Territories.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

THE LATE HONORABLE WESLEY LLOYD

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, with sadness in my heart because of his passing, but with gladness in my heart because of our friendship and acquaintance, I rise along with the many others, to pay tribute to the memory of our friend and colleague, WESLEY LLOYD. When I became a Member of the Seventy-third Congress he was one of my first acquaintances, and we became friends. I will miss him and, indeed, we all will miss him. We have lost a valued friend and an able colleague. His family has lost an affectionate husband and father. His State has lost a representative of rare ability and unquestionable industry. His Nation has lost a patriot statesman.

His vision was not limited to the Pacific Ocean on the west and the mountains to the east, but his conception of his country took in the entire Nation, from Lakes to Gulf, from ocean to ocean. He knew not the problems of one class alone, but understood the composite mind of the American people. He passed away, as I know he would have willed it, in the service of his Nation, State, and fellowman. His passing has left a sadness which will not soon disappear, a vacancy which will be difficult to fill, and has left us with a realization of the broader and higher purposes of life, because of the example he set us.

He had, among his other fine qualities, a rare sense of humor, a gentle courtesy, and a sympathetic understanding of his fellowman. Tolerance was the keynote of his character. He was from the other end of our country but his office was near to mine. I will miss his visits to my office, at the end of a busy day, and the conversations we so often had. I am sure my associations with him were beneficial, as they gave me a more complete understanding of the Nation as a whole.

Washington Irving has said:

> There is a remembrance of the dead to which we turn from the charm of the living. These we would not exchange for the song of pleasure or the bursts of revelry.

Such, I am sure, is our remembrance of WESLEY LLOYD.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk I may be permitted to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand it, we will have general debate tomorrow on a pending appropriations bill, which will allow ample opportunity for anyone to make a speech if he so desires. I think that is the proper way to proceed tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

THE CONSTITUTION AS A LIVING, GROWING ORGANISM

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by me in Knoxville, Tenn., on January 8.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I am offering, under leave to extend my remarks, the address delivered by me before the John Randolph Neal College of Law, at Knoxville, Tenn., on January 8, 1936. I feel that the subject matter of this address and the current discussion concerning the Constitution and the power of the Supreme Court to declare acts of Congress unconstitutional justify me in explaining that I received the invitation to deliver this address early in December 1935 with the expectation that it would be delivered some time about the middle of December 1935. Consequently, the address was prepared before that time, and was not changed in any respect after the Supreme Court of the United States rendered its decision in the Hoosac Mills case on January 4, 1936, holding the Agricultural Administration Act to be unconstitutional, because beyond the power of Congress to legislate as to matters reserved, under the Federal Constitution, to the States.

While it is distressing to many of our fellow citizens that this act has been held to be unconstitutional, yet out of all of this agitation much good should result. It should, and I believe will, lead the masses of our people to give serious and earnest thought to the fundamental questions lying beneath our system of government. We have been too much inclined to take our good government as a matter of course. We need to think of what would have been our fate except for our great constitutional system. More soberly and seriously must we think what will in the future be our fate if we throw overboard this great framework of government, or if we should so modify it as to eliminate that wise counterbalancing of checks and restraints of one department against another department, so as to insure cool deliberation before final action, and thus to prevent impetuous and overhasty legislation that might result in hardships and injustice to some of our people. Governments and constitutions are not set up for the protection of the majority. The majority in power at a given time can take care of itself. Governments and constitutions are set up to protect minorities and individuals. This is necessary because the minority party of today may become the majority party of tomorrow. If each succeeding majority party were at liberty to take vengeance and reprisals upon the minority, as has happened in other countries, and as is now happening in some countries, then American constitutional liberty would be dead. Constitutions are set up so that when a given party is in power it must legislate not for its own members alone, and not for any groups of citizens, but must legislate for all citizens by general laws so that those in the minority party get the benefit of any wise legislation enacted by the majority party, and both majority and minority must suffer alike from unwise legislation so enacted.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I am hereby submitting for printing in the RECORD the said address delivered on January 8, 1936, but prepared before December 15, 1935.

THE FLESH AND BLOOD OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION

Mr. President, gentlemen of the faculty, and law students, when I was a boy the famous encomium by William E. Gladstone that the Federal Constitution is "the most wonderful document ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man" was frequently quoted. This high praise inspired me with a desire to read and know the Constitution. But when I began to read and to try to understand it, I found it dry as dust and dark as midnight. Gladstone had all of the history and knowledge of government as a background to fill in the flesh and blood of this bare governmental skeleton. I as a boy lacked the necessary knowledge, and consequently could not then understand that great instrument of government. To me then it was mere words.

Even to the first President the Constitution was a mere framework, around which soon began to grow the flesh of legislative action and executive and administrative precedent; but it would have grown lopsided and unbalanced except for the regulatory blood stream of judicial action. Later, after many years, the whole Federal body learned to respond to the nerve impulses of public opinion. Now, for more than 100 years, the analogy to the functions of the highest form of organic life, the human body, has been striking.

The growth of this Federal constitutional body has been slow and its development gradual. If one will read that amazing volume entitled "A View of the Federal Constitution", by William Rawle, written in 1825, and used for some years as a textbook in the United States Military Academy at West Point, one will realize how limited then was the vision of the true scope of Federal jurisdiction. Even Thomas Jefferson, accepted by many competent to judge as the greatest political philosopher of all times, interpreted Federal functions in the light of the then rural conditions of the population. About the year 1830 Justice Joseph Story began to write and publish his several commentaries upon the Federal Constitution, and he advanced certain liberal and elastic constructions of the Constitution, which many of his day cordially condemned, but which have since been justified by the progress of events. John C. Calhoun and other writers of his school argued with unanswerable logic for a strict and literal interpretation of the great instrument of confederation. But the logic of evens outruns and crushes the logic of thoughts and words. Though many of that time thought Webster's poetic sentences and speeches were purely fanciful, yet today both Story and Webster would be back numbers, as actual conditions have far outrun their extremist views.

Then followed the Civil War, with its vast expansion of Federal power, and this in turn was followed by the fourteenth amendment, which virtually gave the United States Supreme Court the right of review of every decision by the highest court of any State on questions of "due process of law" and the "equal protection of the law." With the results of easy victory over the ancient monarchy of Spain in 1898, the United States arose to the first rank among the great powers of the world. Being now a great world power, no longer a loose confederation of remote and detached communities, largely devoted to agriculture, it was necessary that our National Government exercise all the powers ordinarily incident to great sovereign States. And so we stand today.

But as the Nation advanced in power and prestige and authority, the several States receded by the same ratio in relative power and importance. Originally the words "States' rights" were an expression for a very real and vigorous sentiment for the exercise by the States of all the sovereign power inherent in any people, except that part of the sovereign power expressly conferred by the Constitution upon the Federal Government. Back of this strict constitutional division of governmental power was a certain philosophy. To the popular mind, the expression "States' rights" still represents the Anglo-Saxon inherited attachment for local self-government. This local autonomy is still believed by some to be the best agency for promoting individual freedom and personal liberty. But it was an especially pleasing idea for a rural population living under an agrarian economy. With the coming of the machine age, with quick transportation and instantaneous communication, and with an overwhelming preponderance of the people engaged in manufacturing and in commerce, mere sentiment about local self-government was overwhelmed by the desire and demand for financial and economic well-being.

AS FEDERAL POWER INCREASES, STATE POWER DECREASES

To increase the rate at which State power receded and Federal power increased, the failure by many, if not all, of the States to recognize that rights and duties are correlative was another cause of decline. In order to preserve their rights, the States must perform their duties. They not only permit but actually invite the Federal Government to enter into their several domains and to perform functions which the States themselves could perform. Thus they have deliberately contributed to their own decline.

Consequently but few independent functions are now performed by the States, and it requires no prophet to foretell that if the present tendency continues, the States will before long be mere geographical subdivisions, preserving the name and shadow but no longer possessing the substance of "sovereign States." We must confess at this time the momentum seems well-nigh irresistible. If the tendency continues, then the next generation will find that what we once prized and boasted as an "indissoluble Union of indestructible States" will be the "indivisible consolidation of defunct States."

THE LIMIT OF INTERPRETATIVE AMENDMENT

Due to the very general language of the Federal Constitution the courts have hitherto been able to sustain nearly all of the legislation that became necessary in order to meet the economic conditions of the country. But the signs of the times now indicate that we are approaching the limit of "judicial stretching." The courts of today seek consistency with the courts of yesterday. The gravity of "stare decisis" has always properly exercised a powerful pull over judicial minds. Otherwise courts and legislatures would be completely at sea without chart and compass. If the language cannot be further stretched, and if the people shall demand a further extension of Federal power, what is the answer? Will it be stagnation or progress? We cannot stand still. We must and will advance. This great issue the country must soon squarely face. Any sapping and mining methods should cease. Proposed enlargement of Federal power should be brought out into the open, considered thoughtfully by all the people, and acted upon in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. I am on record as saying in the last session of the Congress "I will not trifle with my oath to support and defend the Constitution." Neither will I "pass the buck" of responsibility to the courts. If I have any convictions based upon 40 years of the study of the Constitution, I should follow them while voting upon legislation. Judges are under no higher obligation to defend the Constitution than are Members of Congress. If we do not respect our own oath, will the judges respect theirs?

AMENDMENTS MAY CHANGE BUT NOT DESTROY

But do not get the impression that I regard the Constitution as a rigid and unchangeable chart of Government. I would not be understood as opposing any and all amendments to the Constitution. I have often said, and I sincerely believe, that the most American, the most democratic, the most republican, part of our Constitution is its provision for its own amendment. By amendments we can completely change our present constitutional system. The wisdom or unwisdom of each amendment must be weighed upon its own merits as it is proposed. Personally I see now but little need for change, but I agree that the requisite majority is acting within its constitutional right by forcing any change at any time. Whatever changes may be brought about, it will still be the American Constitution. It will still be the supreme will of the sovereign people. Even though I may differ in opinion as to the propriety, necessity, or wisdom of any change made, yet to the supreme power of the people I gladly bow.

THE SOLE SOURCE OF CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT

While our Constitution is a living, growing organism, it must constantly draw its life from popular support. That somewhat faded parchment encased in marble, brass, and gold at the National Shrine in the Library of Congress, cannot execute or enforce itself. It has had power and vigor only because the people have believed it to be the charter of their rights and the shield of their liberties. Even the great decisions of the Supreme Court have no inherent force for self-execution. Fortunately the people sensibly have acquiesced in those great decisions interpreting the Constitution, and they became to that extent virtual additions to the Constitution itself. The Constitution is what the Supreme Court declares it to be. But so great has been the ability of the members of that Court, so fair and free from partisan or sectional bias their judgment, that our people have almost universally accepted Supreme Court decisions without murmur.

Calvin Coolidge wisely wrote on December 12, 1924: "The Constitution is not self-perpetuating. If it is to survive, it will be because it has public support." We ask for popular confidence in the Constitution and in all its agencies for its execution—the Congress, the President, and the Supreme Court. We do not expect this confidence to rest upon any blind and unreasoning worship of an ancient document. We ask for an open-eyed, intelligent understanding of what that great covenant has meant to our country, and the whole world, of what it means to us today, and of what it will mean to our children and to our children's children.

Edmund Burke truly likened existing social institutions to a continuing sacred compact between the dead, the living, and the unborn. How applicable is that simile to our Federal Constitution. The founding fathers employed not only their own experience, knowledge, and wisdom, but adopted and appropriated all that was best and suitable in the experience of all former generations within recorded history. Who would foolishly suggest that we now throw overboard all this treasure of accumulated wisdom and leave our children to stumble and stagger in darkness along some untried road? It is not ancestor worship, but common sense, to benefit by the experience of our forefathers. Our debt to our ancestors can be discharged only by transmitting to posterity the social, economic, and governmental institutions of our day not only unimpaired but somewhat improved by our own efforts. Thus and thus only is "freedom broadened slowly down from precedent to precedent." We, "the heirs of all the ages", must bequeath the whole estate with accretions to our issue in perpetuity.

TALK OF AMENDMENT IS NOT TREASON

To talk of amending the Constitution by no means implies irreverence for that great instrument, nor for its great framers. It is true they themselves doubted the adoption and the permanency of their proposal. Fortunately, as often happens in human affairs, "they builded better than they knew." Amendment is the very life principle of the Constitution. It was itself an amendment to, in the form of a substitution for, the Articles of Confederacy. The Declaration of Independence had said, among other things, that "when any government becomes destructive of these ends (life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness) it is the right, it is the duty, of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute in its stead a new government."

Edmond Randolph, of Virginia, author of the Virginia Plan, said: "Provision ought to be made for the amendment of the Articles of Union." Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, credited by many as being the originator of the peculiar idea of dual sovereignty over the same people at the same time, had a provision for amendment in his plan.

George Mason, of Virginia, author of the first Bill of Rights, said: "Amendments will be necessary, and it will be better to provide for them in an easy, regular, and constitutional way than to trust to chance and violence." In this sentiment Edmond Randolph concurred.

James Madison, commonly called the Father of the Constitution, in the Federalist, No. 41, said: "It is in vain to oppose constitutional barriers to the impulse of self-preservation", and again James Madison, in the Federalist, No. 43, said: "Useful alterations will be suggested by experience that could not be foreseen."

George Washingtin in his Farewell Address of September 17, 1796, said: "The basis of our political system is the right of the people to make and to alter their Constitution which at any time exists; until changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people it is sacredly obligatory upon all." Again Washington in speaking of the benefits of the new system of government which he was commending with fatherly solicitude to his fellow citizens and their posterity, called attention to the fact that the Constitution contains "within itself a provision for its own amendment."

Thomas Jefferson in a letter written September 7, 1803, said: "Our peculiar security is in the possession of a written Constitution. Let us not make it a blank paper by construction."

WHAT SOME ORIGINAL AND RESPONSIBLE THINKERS HAVE SAID

Andrew Johnson in his first annual message to Congress, December 4, 1865, used this strong language: "The parting advice of the Father of his Country, while yet President, to the people of the United States was that the free Constitution which was the work of their hands, might be sacredly maintained; and of the inaugural words of President Jefferson held up 'the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad.'"

Grover Cleveland, in his inaugural address, March 4, 1885, reminds us that the Constitution is a mutual covenant between those who govern and the citizens who support and defend the Government, as follows: "But he who takes the oath today to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States only assumes the solemn obligation which every patriotic citizen—on the farm, in the workship, in the busy marts of trade, and everywhere—should share with him."

Theodore Roosevelt, in his address at St. Louis on October 2, 1907, warns us that the Constitution must be a living and therefore changing organism. This striking language is typical of the vision of its author: "The Constitution is now and must remain what it always has been; but it can only be interpreted as the interests of the whole people demand if interpreted as a living organism designed to meet the conditions of life and not of death."

Woodrow Wilson, in his book on constitutional government, showing the necessity that the Constitution must grow as the people grow, said: "If it were not so, the written document would become too stiff a garment for the living."

Franklin D. Roosevelt, in his inaugural address of March 4, 1933, pays his tribute to your organic law: "* * * Our Constitution is so simple and practical that it is possible always to meet extraordinary needs by changes in emphasis and arrangement without loss of essential form. That is why our constitutional system has proved itself the most superbly enduring political mechanism the modern world has produced. It has met every stress of vast territory, of foreign war, of bitter internal strife, of world relations."

DO NOT AMEND BY CHISELING, MINING, AND SAPPING

I must dissent most respectfully from some statements in the article by James Truslow Adams entitled "The Crisis and the Constitution", in January 1936 Scribner's, as follows: "The Constitution can be changed in many ways other than that of formal amendments. * * * As a matter of fact, the Constitution has been constantly altered by many methods. * * * However legal-minded and conservative they are, they can find a way round the Constitution when they are sufficiently united on an important issue in a national crisis." I take issue with this philosophical historian, Mr. Adams, for the reason that it seems unwise to advise "side-stepping" the Constitution by any means whatsoever. Whatever apparent changes may come about as the result of legislation, or Executive action, or judicial decision, are implicit in the Constitution itself. It is merely a case of where the vines and leaves and fruit have grown naturally from what Woodrow Wilson called "the vigorous taproot." When the Constitution is to be amended, it ought to be brought openly and consciously before the people, and let them grant or refuse the additional power. Such method will keep the people constantly alert to their civic duties. It will constantly compel them to study and understand the fundamental principles of our Government. To study and to decide constitutional questions will raise the people above the superficialities and hypocricies of partisan politics. Each time such proposed amendment is taken to the people it will constitute in fact a solemn referendum and a stirring appeal to their civic consciousness.

Therefore, let the people understand that they themselves are responsible for their Government. Let them give or deny all governmental power. Away with the impatience of constitutional restraint and away with the suggestion that because the Constitution is slow of amendment it may be disregarded or violated in the haste of emergencies, whether actual or imaginary, whether in peace or in war. If the method of amendment is too slow and difficult, then let the people consider amending that particular part of the Constitution so as to render it more rapidly responsive to the popular will. But let us make sure that this so-called popular will is based upon knowledge, after full and fair consideration, and is not prompted by prejudice and partisan feeling.

SUPREME COURT UNDER FIRE

Much agitation and too much feeling are manifested toward the Supreme Court for doing its conscientious duty in declaring certain acts of Congress unconstitutional. It is charged that this power has been gradually and unjustifiably usurped by the Supreme Court; that since the Constitution did not expressly say that the Supreme Court might declare acts of Congress unconstitutional, no such power was intended, and therefore that the conduct of the Supreme Court in presuming to say that certain attempted laws are void because unconstitutional is arrogant and rapacious. A little calm consideration will show that this raving against the Supreme Court is not justifiable. When cases come before the Court in which it is charged that there is a conflict between the Constitution and the statute, and if it manifestly appears that both cannot stand because inconsistent, then the Supreme Court must decide which is paramount, and, therefore, which is binding upon the Court, the Constitution, or the statute.

Surely no sane person will doubt for a minute that in case of such conflict the Constitution must prevail. But it is urged that in cases of such doubt or uncertainty that the Court divides, either 5 to 4 or 6 to 3, it indicates such uncertainty as to repel the thought the statute is in conflict with the Constitution. But we must remember that it is only cases of doubt, only borderline cases, only twilight-zone cases, that come before the Supreme Court. In the first place, Congress also is bound to support and defend the Constitution and to bear full faith and allegiance to same; and, consequently, the Congress would itself seldom, if ever, enact a statute clearly and obviously in conflict with the Constitution. Where some of the Congress are in doubt, but by a bare majority pass a law, then any citizen adversely affected by that law surely can claim that perhaps Congress misunderstood the Constitution. The only place to make that contention is in the courts, and it will finally reach the Supreme Court. Since Congress has not fixed any definite majority of the Supreme Court Justices necessary to hold an act unconstitutional, then surely the Supreme Court acts by the same majority that acted in Congress. The minority in Congress thought the act unconstitutional. When the case comes before the Supreme Court the minority view in Congress may become the majority view of the Supreme Court.

All lawsuits must be finally decided by somebody. Even athletic contests, sports, and games require umpires. In a baseball game, where the ball reaches the home plate when the forced runner is halfway between bases, no one questions that he is out, and in such case no umpire is necessary. All players on both sides readily acquiesce in the obvious result. But where the runner is sliding to the home plate just as the ball reaches the hands of the catcher, and where movements are so quick that it is difficult for the other players to do their duty, and yet decide the question of out or safe, then the function of the umpire begins, and his decision, right or wrong, must stand. He must be assumed to be honest, conscientious, and competent. It is the same way with the courts. They umpire all cases, and nobody questions the rightness of their decisions except in a few border-line cases.

Let us take another illustration. Suppose the Congress should pass a statute in contravention of the first amendment to the Constitution, which provides that Congress shall pass no law respecting the establishment of religion or preventing the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. Suppose such act of Congress violated every one of these inhibitions by penalizing criminally and subjecting to fine and imprisonment any person professing a certain religious faith and casting into prison those who might speak and write in criticism of this statute, and punishing with heavy penalties all those who might assemble and protest against such law and sign a petition to the Government asking for its repeal. This is not a very farfetched supposition.

Remember that the Congress in the last days of the eighteenth century passed the alien and sedition laws. Now, suppose a citizen is arrested, tried, and convicted of violating this statute—penalizing religious worship. What is the person to do? Suppose the trial court holds the act to be constitutional. The trial judge says he thinks the Congress did right in passing such a statute. Must the citizen submit to punishment in such case? Surely all will agree that such citizen should appeal his case finally to the Supreme Court of the United States. Suppose there is a difference of opinion even in the Supreme Court. Suppose that four of the judges think that Congress had the power to pass the statute. Suppose that four of the judges were not to be controlled by their conscientious doubts on the question of constitutionality. Suppose that such four of the judges were appointees of the majority party in power, which passed the statute in question. Suppose four of the judges thought, as some people are now saying, that the Supreme Court ought not to declare any act of Congress unconstitutional. But suppose the other five judges say that the act in question does manifestly and clearly conflict with the first amendment. In such a case, should not the five judges so declare, and so hold, and should not their opinion be the judgment of the Court itself? True, the Court has no power to enforce its decrees. True, the Court could not compel the United States marshal to release the prisoner. True, the President, in command of the Army, could hold the prisoner even as against the marshal. But would such conduct be American?

Have not all citizens, including the President, and the United States marshal, and the State Governors, agreed to play this game of Americanism, this game of democracy, as good sports, in a fair spirit, and to abide by the decision of the umpire? We have always heretofore done so, and that marks our civilization as a people. If we wish to fix a definite majority of the Justices to constitute the opinion of the Court on a constitutional question, let the Congress do so, but not rail at the Court. If we think that the Court ought not to possess the power to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional, let us adopt a constitutional amendment to that effect, thus declaring by our act that the Constitution of the United States is nothing but a "scrap of paper", or rubber band, nothing but a compilation of pious platitudes, and that the acts of Congress are in all cases paramount to the Constitution. When we do this, let us do it with our eyes open. Let us then know that the Congress can by law fix the term of the President for 8 years, or 25 years, and no court can stay such law. Let us remember then that the Congress can by law deprive any citizen of the writ of habeas corpus and let him rot in jail. Let us realize that the Congress can then pass a law permitting citizens to be tried without indictment, without a jury, and to suffer cruel and unusual punishment. Let us understand that then Congress can pass laws taking the property of some citizen for public use without paying for it. Let us not be surprised if then the Congress should delegate all of its legislative power to the Executive, and by reason of orders, decrees, and edicts, citizens may be thrown into jail and left to languish, and finally die without having a trial. Let us not forget that then America could be converted into a condition as bad, if not worse, than the worst days of Bolshevik tyranny following the Russian revolution. With our eyes open, if we walk into this condition, then we ought to suffer the inevitable consequences, and see our Christian civilization collapse and crumble to ruin. Only by suffering can the stiff-necked be taught wisdom.

GOVERNMENT MUST REFLECT NEEDS AND WISHES OF THE PEOPLE

That any government in these modern times must ultimately respond to the demands of people is testified to by Elihu Root, speaking in 1906, as follows:

"The governmental control which they (the people) deem just and necessary they will have. It may be that such control would better be exercised in particular instances by the governments of the States, but the people will have the control they need either from the States or from the National Government; and if the States fail to furnish it in due measure, sooner or later constructions of the Constitution will be found to vest the power where it will be exercised—in the National Government. The true and only way to preserve State authority is to be found in the awakened conscience of the States, their broadened views and higher standard of responsibility to the general public; in effective legislation by the States in conformity to the general moral sense of the country; and in the vigorous exercise for the general public good of that State authority which is to be preserved."

But until the great change is made to conform to the solemn will of the people, I feel we should heed the warning of John Fiske, who wrote in The Critical Period of American History, published nearly 50 years ago, as follows:

"If the day should ever arrive," which God forbid, "when the people of the different parts of our country shall allow their local affairs to be administered by prefects sent from Washington, and when the self-government of the States shall have been so far lost as that of the Departments of France, or even so far as that of the counties of England—on that day the progressive political career of the American people will have come to an end, and the hopes that have been built upon it for the future happiness and prosperity of mankind will be wrecked forever."

But above the bony structure of the human body, above flesh and blood, even above nerve and nerve centers, is the spirit of man. Nations have something analogous to the individual spirit. It must be the composite of all the spiritual forces of a people. It is difficult to define in words this spirit of a nation. Of course, it is many-sided and multiform. But I think Julian Hawthorne expressed it well, writing in the introduction to his History of the United States in 1898 as follows:

"In these volumes I have taken the view that the American Nation is the embodiment and vehicle of a divine purpose to emancipate and enlighten the human race. Man is entering upon a new career of spiritual freedom; he is to enjoy a hitherto unprecedented condition of political, social, and moral liberty, as distinguished from license, which in truth is slavery. The stage for this grand evolution was fixed in the Western Continent, and the pioneers who went thither were inspired with the desire to escape from the thralldom of the past and to nourish their souls with that pure and exquisite freedom which can afford to ignore the ease of the body and all temporal luxuries for the sake of that elixir of immortality. This, according to my thinking, is the innermost core of the American idea; if you go deep enough into surface manifestations, you will find it. It is what differentiates Americans from all other peoples; it is what makes Americans out of emigrants; it is what draws the masses of Europe hither and makes their rulers fear and hate us. It may often and uniformly happen that any given individual is unconscious of the spirit that moves within him, for it is the way of that spirit to subordinate its manifestations to its ends, knowing the frailty of humanity. But it is there, and its gradual and cumulative results are seen in the retrospect, and it may perhaps be divined as to the outline of some of its future developments.

Some sort of recognition of the American idea and of the American destiny affords the only proper ground for American patriotism. We talk of the size of our country, of its wealth and prosperity, of its physical power, of its enlightenment; but if these things be all that we have to be proud of, we have little. They are in truth but outward signs of a far more precious possession within. We are the pioneers of the new day or we are nothing worth talking about. We are at the threshold of our career. Our record thus far is full of faults and presents not a few deformities, due to our human frailties and limitations, but our general direction has been onward and upward.

The poet epitomizes the whole idea in a few words:

"America hath a mission all her own, to preach and practice before the world, the dignity and divinity of man, the glorious claims of human brotherhood, and the soul's allegiance to none but God."

THE CITADEL AND SUMMERALL

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of The Citadel and Summerall Military College in the State of South Carolina.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I venture to call to the attention of my colleagues and the whole country the splendid service being rendered to the cause of education and of national defense by The Citadel, a strictly military college, at Charleston, S. C., under the leadership of Gen. Charles P. Summerall.

The people of the United States, and especially the people of South Carolina, are fortunate in that one of our great schools is headed by a man of the character and accomplishments of Gen. Charles Pelot Summerall. The institution to which I refer is the Military College of South Carolina, popularly known for about one hundred years as The Citadel. Located at Charleston, S. C., this venerable institution has been a powerful influence in the formation of the characters of many of our leading citizens. When General Summerall retired from the Army with the rank of full general, the board of visitors of The Citadel immediately thought of asking him to head their great institution of learning. I was happy to be one of those who urged upon General Summerall the acceptance of this wonderful opportunity to continue his life of useful service to the Nation. It seemed to many of us a most fitting thing that General Summerall should crown a life of public service and of military glory by devoting his talents and his rich and varied experience to the cause of education. In so doing, he would be following the example of such great soldiers as Robert E. Lee, Stephen D. Lee, John A. Lejeune, William R. Smith, and many others who turned from a career of arms to the cause of instructing, inspiring, and guiding young men.

Happily, General Summerall was not slow to see the finger of duty pointing at him to continue to serve his country. Happily for us all, that finger seemed to point directly to The Citadel at Charleston, S. C. Since his life and his fame had heretofore belonged to the whole Nation, so it came about that his service as president of The Citadel has been not merely local and not confined to the citizenry of South Carolina, but the appeal has been extended into many other States. The consequence is that a majority of the students who entered the freshman class at The Citadel in September 1935 came from other States and from outside the borders of South Carolina. This is a tribute not only to the high quality of instruction and training always heretofore given at The Citadel, but it is also a tribute to the respect and confidence that the people everywhere, who know General Summerall, have in him. They know that his life as an Army officer has been exceptional; they know that so exemplary and high in morals has been his conduct and course of living that young men may be committed to his general supervision and care with full confidence, that no word from his lip would ever set them an unworthy example. I think I am correct in saying that General Summerall has never used tobacco in any form, has never used alcoholic beverages in any form, has never indulged in profanity; that no obscene or foul language ever escapes his lips, and that his daily work and conduct in life generally are as upright morally as is his military carriage and bearing, straight and upright physically.

Therefore, mothers and fathers from every part of the country may commit their sons to the care and training of The Citadel with full confidence that their time will be properly spent in preparation for life's duties and that they will not be wasting precious money and still more precious time and opportunity in idleness or in riotous conduct. The daily discipline at The Citadel is rightly and properly rigid and strictly military. We of South Carolina are proud to say that "The Citadel is the West Point of the South." The cadets at The Citadel are always under strict military discipline. They are kept busy at their studies, their recitations, their drills, and at military instruction except during the hours of necessary rest and sleep. Fathers and mothers with their sons at The Citadel may know and do know where their boys are every hour of the day and every hour of the night. That is a source of great satisfaction to mothers and fathers. They know that their sons are receiving proper instruction and guidance and that they have no opportunity to indulge in wild parties, in boisterous misconduct, or in practices harmful to their health or destructive of their moral character.

Some people, who are theorists and inclined to be pacifists, may express opposition to military training; but fathers and mothers who have sons of college age want to know where their boys are, not only in the daytime but especially at night.

Recently I was in a college town and had to catch a 3 o'clock train. Long before I was called by the night clerk at the hotel I had been awakened by loud talking, running, heavy walking, shouting, and screaming in other rooms of the hotel. When I made inquiry, I was told that the disturbance was caused by intoxicated young men from the college. Needless to say, it was not a school where military training and discipline prevailed. I thought of the contrast. It is a very strange idea that some people have that military training for a boy of college age will make a militarist out of him. The very opposite is apt to be the truth. While it will not make a pacifist out of him, and will inspire him with genuine patriotism, it will enable him to appraise and to judge the proper limits of militarism and prepare him as a citizen soldier to help defend his country, without surrendering the right and duty of defense to the professional soldiers, from whom the dangers of militarism might come. Of course, the small force of professional soldiers in America can never be a menace or a source of danger from militarism. Since we have no military caste or clique, and since the officer ranks are constantly recruited from civilian sources, many of them from humble homes, it is impossible to build up in America a military faction that would ever be dangerous to the public liberties.

Due to the fact that our Regular Army officers, certainly most of them, come from nonmilitary homes, and that many of them—in fact, more than one-half of them—have come either directly from civilian life or from the ranks of the Army, the Army as a whole is kept constantly in touch with the thoughts and feelings of the civilian population. Personally, I trust that this may ever continue to be the state of affairs. That is why I have so strongly urged that never shall more than one-half of the officers in the Army be graduates of the Military Academy at West Point. While the overwhelming majority of the cadets come from civilian homes, yet the indoctrination which they generally receive at such an impressionable age is apt to take them out of touch with civilian affairs and to give them the purely and exclusively military and Army point of view. This is no reflection upon either the institution or its graduates. In the eyes of many, it is a desirable condition, but I think it is the well-agreed opinion in the Army now, even among graduates of the United States Military Academy, that it would be unwise for the Army to have on the average more than one-half of its officers graduates of the Military Academy. With the other half, coming more directly from civilian life, coming into the Army at a more mature age, having been educated at their own expense, who are in close touch with the sacrifices that fathers and mothers make to give an education, this other half of the officers of the Army help to keep the Army in closer and more direct touch and sympathy with the civilian population.

I hold it will be greatly to the advantage of the Army as a fighting force—and therefore to the advantage of the country—that there should be these two about equally balanced officer groups in the Army. It will bring about a natural, proper, and beneficial rivalry between these two groups. Friendships will be formed between officers coming from the different groups. A proper pride will stimulate the individuals in the different groups to seek to excel, not only for his own sake but for the sake of the group. This pride of group may thus be turned to the advantage of the Army as a whole. It will prevent stagnation and contentment in the individuals; it will compel officers to stand upon their individual merits, and not to count upon class cooperation and class influence. Whatever promotes the progress of the individual officer, whatever stimulates him to work harder, whatever inspires him to nobler conduct and purer life, will contribute to the uplifting and strengthening of the Army as a whole. Thus, the investment of the Nation in the cause of national defense will bear better dividends, thus, the cause of national defense itself is promoted, and thus the life of the Nation will be strengthened and preserved.

It is a most remarkable tribute to General Summerall that Lt. Gen. Robert Lee Bullard, in his volume published in 1925, entitled "Personalities and Reminiscences of the War", devotes one whole chapter to General Summerall. The chapter is headed simply "Summerall." All of us know that General Bullard commanded the Second Army of the American Expeditionary Force. General Bullard impressed himself upon the nearly one-half million soldiers who comprised the Second Army as an intrepid soldier and leader, but, above all, as a gentleman of the highest and most humane impulses. Since his retirement General Bullard has been devoting his time and strength to the promotion of the cause of national defense along advanced and progressive lines.

General Bullard has not been content to look backward, but basing his thinking and deductions upon past experience, and using modern weapons and devices, especially the military airplane, as a minor premise, General Bullard has drawn conclusions as to the nature of future warfare, and has warned our people that we must constantly keep abreast in all the latest appliances for the mechanization of the Army, and especially to the use to its maximum capacity of that very late and all-important air power. It is not extravagant to say that General Bullard has rendered his country invaluable service since his retirement. It is within the bounds of fair judgment to say that his service since retirement may equal in importance his service before retirement. While his genius and magnetic personality contributed greatly to the winning of the World War, yet his vision, his freedom from the slavery of tradition, his self-adjustment to modern methods and to modern weapons, and his courage to cry aloud from the housetop to his brother officers and to his countrymen that they must look in the future to a new and partially strange kind of warfare, will largely contribute to our success in any future war in which we may become unfortunately involved.

I therefore quote some brief passages from that chapter on "Summerall":

At the end of the World War, though he had himself always been an artilleryman, he was worshipped by infantrymen, by all infantrymen who served closely enough to know him.

To my delight, I got Summerall. When he came, I found that in the years that I had not seen him, since the days of the Philippines, he had in no way changed. His zeal in the service, his sense of duty, left nothing to be desired. His industry knew no fatigue. He was all the time visiting and inspecting his command, and always inspiring, always most exacting as to fulfillment of duty by officers and men, uncompromising and unforgetting, yet always accepted by officers and men. They soon both feared and loved him. He possessed the quality of giving the severest reprimand in the quietest words. With the reprimand went no mercy, yet it roused no rebellion. The recipients seemed to feel its justice and accepted it. With such a faculty of reproof he secured correction.

Along with these military qualities he carried the highest qualities of manhood, loyalty, and honor. He seemed incapable of thinking or doing a dishonorable, disloyal, or crooked thing. For such conduct he had the highest contempt, which he did not hesitate to express. All men associated with him thus soon came to know him, and respect followed as surely as acquaintance. In all these things his force carried conviction and acceptance.

His sense of justice was as great as his sense of loyalty, honor, and duty. He let no man who merited it go unrecognized or unrewarded. No trouble was too great for him to try to secure such recognition or reward. He would talk or write until it was done. It is needless to say that here is found his popularity with the simple soldier. He never coddled, he sometimes even treated the soldiers with a calm, uncompromising harshness, but the soldier that did something under Summerall was never forgotten. As a consequence of these qualities he was a man who was able to secure almost fanatical support and confidence from his inferiors. What he said should be done was done. Those who did it not from love or confidence did it from fear.

The combination of these qualities could but produce a wonderful career. They secured the confidence of everybody, high and low. Summerall in every way was a high type of the personal leader. His officers and soldiers got ready for him: they wanted to please and feared to displease him; and his career is an illustration of the truth that a man of conviction carries success and greatness in him. He entered the World War as a lieutenant colonel of artillery. He came out of it a major general commanding a corps, with the prospect, had the war lasted long enough to form a third or fourth army, of becoming a lieutenant general commanding an army.

Of this soldier never had I a shadow of a doubt from the day that I came to know him, nor had those devoted and skillful artillerists, the French, from the day they saw him and his guns on the line beside them. At Soissons, as a major general, he fought his division with the fierceness of a fanatic. In this battle his division fought twice as long and remained in line of battle facing the enemy two and a half times as long as any other division, American or French, there taking part. In the Meuse-Argonne, I was told, he was equally fierce and driving, and in his eagerness on the last day made the "break" of allowing, if not ordering, one of the divisions of his corps to cross the line of advance of one or more French divisions in order to press first into Sedan. I think the French forgave him, for they have continued to load his men with citations and decorations, and have granted especial favors to the American officer, Gen. Frank Parker, commanding that division.

NEUTRALITY

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an able address delivered on January 9 under the auspices of the National Council for the Prevention of War by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LAMBETH], in the course of debate on the President's message dealing with foreign affairs and with particular reference to pending neutrality legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. UMSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of J. WALTER LAMBETH, station WOL, Washington, D. C., January 9, 1936, under the auspices of the National Council for Prevention of War:

When the World War ended, Premier Clemenceau, fondly called by his people the "Tiger of France", warned his countrymen, "It is far more difficult to make peace than to make war." Paraphrasing this statement, one might add, "It is far easier to get into war than to keep the peace." The truth of this is proven by chaotic world conditions since the close of the world conflict. Not even our sincere and able war President, Woodrow Wilson, was able to bring about a peace satisfactory to the world, although his efforts for peace were so great that he literally gave his life to the cause.

Last Friday night President Roosevelt, in his message to Congress, clearly defined our objectives as concerns neutrality when he said: "As a consistent part of a clear policy, the United States is following a twofold neutrality toward any and all nations which engage in wars not of immediate concern to the Americas. First, we decline to encourage the prosecution of war by permitting belligerents to obtain arms, ammunition, or implements of war from the United States; second, we seek to discourage the use by belligerent nations of any and all American products calculated to facilitate the prosecution of a war in quantities over and above our normal exports to them in time of peace."

The relations between nations are of such a delicate and complicated nature that no sure formula has yet been given for the prevention of war or for the making of a good peace. Once a policy of neutrality is established, it is hard to revise legislation dealing with this subject. Foreign policies cannot be changed swiftly in the manner of domestic policies. In any discussion of neutrality this point must be borne in mind. It is idle to say that we can enact neutrality legislation which will guarantee peace to this Nation. Our best efforts may be applauded today and regretted 2 years from now. Let us not be lulled to sleep by the false belief that of a certainty we will never enter another war. It is to be devoutly hoped that we go to war no more, but it does not lie within the ingenuity of man to make peace certain by legislation. For centuries China withdrew herself behind a wall and tried to forget the rest of the world. For centuries invaders have crossed the wall and cruelly reminded the Chinese that no nation can live unto itself alone. The oceans are our wall, but modern invention is destroying its effectiveness. Like it or not, we are a member of the family of nations and of the world we must be a part.

Therefore, bearing in mind that we may be dragged into a war regardless of policy, let us examine the methods of endeavoring to keep the peace. In the first place, it is evident that the best way to avoid war is to help prevent war. Because this is true, this country should always leave itself open to cooperate when other nations sincerely strive for peace. When the other nations work for peace, let us be sympathetic and lend a helping hand when we may do so without endangering our own peace. Complete isolation is not only unwise, it shows cowardice and eventually may result in commercial suicide without accomplishing its objective.

The sentiment in this country is stronger for peace than it has ever been. Aside from natural love of peace by Americans—due to the heavy burden of taxation and debt resulting from the last war as well as legislation already enacted by the House and soon to be enacted by the Senate to take the profits out of war—the militaristic group is far less potent than before the World War. The broken bodies of veterans of the last war in hospitals scattered throughout the land will not permit us to forget the horrors of war.

While it will not be wise for the United States to attempt complete isolation, it is wise to adopt legislation which will lay down a neutrality policy. In forming such a policy we should bear in mind that the President has certain great powers under the Constitution beyond the present neutrality resolution. He can sever diplomatic relations with any foreign power. He can write provocative notes. As Commander in Chief he can send troops without a declaration of war, without the authority of Congress. He can send battleships where he will. These powers are fundamental and it is idle to oppose leaving some discretion with the President when under the Constitution he already has powers sufficient to carry us into war. Someone must be trusted and the President and Secretary of State are worthy of confidence. The President must not be hamstrung nor the State Department be put in a strait jacket in the conduct of our foreign affairs.

Because of the fact that it is essential that the President be given some discretion in the matter of foreign affairs, I think the McReynolds neutrality bill preferable to the mandatory and inflexible bill of Senator NYE. The philosophy of the two bills is largely similar, but the difference is wide enough to label the one wise and the other unwise. I believe that the McReynolds bill represents the irreducible minimum in granting discretionary powers to the administration. The issue is nonpartisan and is cutting across party lines.

The McReynolds bill, at the beginning of section 3 (a), reads: "Upon the outbreak or during the progress of any war between, or among, two or more foreign states, the President shall proclaim such fact and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war."

The Nye bill, at the beginning of section 2 (a), reads: "Upon the outbreak of war between, or among, two or more foreign states, or if any such war is in progress on the date of enactment of this act, the President shall proclaim such fact and it shall thereafter be unlawful to export arms, ammunition, or implements of war."

It will be noted that the essential difference between the two bills lies in the clause in the McReynolds bill, "or during the progress of any war." I believe that if this type of wording is to be retained, it is essential that the McReynolds clause shall remain in the bill. Under the modern method of making war, where a nation strikes first, it seldom, if ever, declares war—because of the Kellogg Pact. It is impossible to define by legislation when a war has broken out. It must be left to the discretion of someone, as of the President, to determine whether a foreign difficulty represents merely an exhibition of temper such as a local skirmish on the border or is, in fact, the outbreak of war. In the existing state of affairs, no fixed definition of the outbreak of war can be used in legislation to bring an embargo automatically into effect. The legislation must provide discretion and leave it to the judgment of an individual as to when and if war has broken out.

For example, it might have been reasonably easy to determine that war had broken out between Italy and Ethiopia, though Italy calls it a colonial enterprise. There would have been far more difficulty in determining when and if war had broken out between China and Japan in Manchuria and around Shanghai, and when and if war had broken out between Bolivia and Paraguay, and even whether we had gone to war with Mexico, at Tampico, in 1917. In many cases, but not in all cases, there must be a waiting period between what appears to be an outbreak of hostilities and the determination as to whether they constitute a state of war or whether it is a mere flare-up which might die down and be forgotten in a week or two. In considering neutrality legislation geography must be remembered.

In section 3 (c) the McReynolds bill provides: "The President shall, from time to time, by proclamation, extend such embargo upon the exports of arms, ammunitions, and implements of war to other countries as and when they become involved in such war."

Section 2 (b) of the Nye bill reads: "The President shall, from time to time, by proclamation, extend such embargo upon the exports of arms, ammunition, and implements of war to other states as and when they become engaged as belligerents in such war."

In the case of the McReynolds bill the provision is as to when other foreign countries "become involved" in a war and in the Nye bill provision as to when they "become engaged" as "belligerents" in the war. This section should be very carefully examined and debated in order to determine beyond question that we do not go further than we intend and adopt legislation which would affect our interests very seriously. Article 16 of the League Covenant provides, in part, that if any member of the League resorts to war in disregard of its covenants "it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the League." The League has decided that Italy has disregarded its covenants in this fashion. Theoretically, if not actually, the League nations may now be at war with Italy and Italy with them. Insofar as our proposed legislation is concerned, they would seem to have become "involved" in the Italio-Ethiopian conflict. Theoretically, at least, they are nonaggressive belligerents. The question arises as to whether, under these circumstances, if either of these proposed bills become law with this wording, we would be forced to apply our Italio-Ethiopian embargoes to Britain and France.

Section 4 (a) of the McReynolds bill provides for the restriction of shipments of articles other than arms, ammunition, and implements of war to not more than normal quantities. It leaves it to the President to determine the proper period to use as an "average of shipments." The Nye bill, in section 3 (a), sets the period as the 5 years preceding the outbreak of the war in question. I believe that the President should be given discretion to determine the proper period to use. Circumstances alter cases, not only as to commodities, but as to countries. This has been amply proven in setting up agricultural base periods in this country.

The second difference between the two bills in this section is that in the Nye bill it provides that the President should quota exports of these articles only in case the failure to do so "would endanger the maintenance of peace between the United States and foreign states, or jeopardize the neutrality of the United States."

The McReynolds bill further provides that the President should set up these quotas if it would serve to promote the security and preserve the neutrality of the United States or to protect the lives and commerce of nationals of the United States or that to refrain from placing such restrictions would contribute to a prolongation or expansion of the war.

Here we have the most fundamental, if not the most important, difference between the two bills. The McReynolds bill would seek to prevent this country, by reason of shipments abroad, from contributing to the prolongation or expansion of the war. The Nye bill takes no account of this factor.

Another basic difference is that in section 6 the McReynolds bill provides: "Any embargo, prohibition, or restriction that may be imposed by or under the provisions of sections 2, 3, or 4 of this act shall apply equally to all belligerents, unless the Congress, with the approval of the President, shall declare otherwise."

There is no such provision in the Nye bill, and this section is of vital importance. Under this section, if our friendly neighbors, as, for example, Canada and Mexico, were attacked by some non-American country, such as an Asiatic power, Congress and the President, acting jointly, could allow shipment of war materials to them.

I am convinced that we must give some discretion to the President, if we are not actually to increase the danger of becoming involved in war, if we are not to risk the loss of a large part of foreign trade to no possible advantage, if we are not to incur the enmity of all foreign nations, and if we are not to find, at some later date, that our neutrality proposals have become a boomerang and will return to smite us when we are in desperate need of some foreign raw materials.

Further, I cannot subscribe to the doctrine of the complete isolationists. To do so would mean that in the event of foreign war we might have no foreign trade at all. Worse than that, we, a great Nation, would be looked upon abroad as a nation of "Caspar Milquetoasts", the spineless character in the comic strips.

In the few moments left at my disposal I wish to quote from a statement made by that thoughtful statesman who has so ably steered our foreign relations in recent troubled times. I refer to Secretary of State Cordell Hull. That statement to which I refer was issued November 6, 1935, and may well be used as a guide for neutrality legislation:

"Our policy as a member of the community of nations should be twofold—first, to avoid being brought into a war, and, second, to promote as far as possible the interests of international peace and good will. A virile policy tempered with prudent caution is necessary if we are to retain the respect of other nations and at the same time hold our position of influence for peace and international stability in the family of nations."

NEUTRALITY

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address which I made last week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Hampshire?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me over the radio on January 9:

The address delivered by the President to Congress on Friday night has evoked various opinions.

While to me a large part of the message embodied appeals to class prejudice and tended to increase class feeling rather than being a message to Congress on the state of the Union, yet I commend the first part of the message, in which he stresses the Nation's desire for peace and endorses a neutrality program to contribute thereto.

It is a satisfaction that the Executive apparently has modified the views on neutrality which he held last August. Then, when a committee of nine Congressmen, of whom I was privileged to be one, waited upon him in the interests of neutrality, it was his contention that the Congress should not make the bill mandatory and deny power to the Executive to designate the aggressor nation in any conflict.

The Congress will shortly act upon a neutrality program, and the force behind this program is a Nation-wide sentiment for peace, stronger and more articulate than ever before.

It is no reflection on the President that we demand a mandatory neutrality law with no permissive or discretionary power to be vested in him.

I believe the Congress is going to implement the Nation's purpose to keep out of foreign war by enacting into law a neutrality program which will embody every possible aid toward the accomplishment of such purpose.

Holding in mind in all this discussion the great objective "peace", the neutrality program, which we hope to enact into law, will cost us something, but we should be willing and glad to pay the price. The price is the foregoing of opportunities for commercial and financial profit that have heretofore accrued from trade and commerce with belligerents.

I believe in a thoroughgoing, complete, and as effective a neutrality program as can be drawn, applying to all belligerents.

To the often-cited objection that embargoes applied to all belligerents will affect them differently, that on one hand some may be helped while others may be handicapped, that is probably true, but I believe it cannot be avoided.

That is not what we seek to do, however. Our whole aim is to keep the United States out of any war, to have no dealings with belligerents as such, and, abhorring war, to have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness.

Our neutrality program must include provisions to bar loans to belligerents, and what is equally important, to prohibit the granting of commercial credits.

The present law should be continued as far as it applies to travel by American citizens, denying them protection if they travel on ships of belligerents, and prohibiting the entrance into American ports of submarines or armed merchant vessels.

Last August, when those of us who were interested in neutrality were working earnestly to enact a law, traveling to New York one night, I met one of the leading industrialists of the country. In commenting on the neutrality law he called it a fool bill, and said, "Don't you realize that if business interests cannot sell to those warring nations that Soviet Russia and other nations will get the business?" And my answer was, "Yes; I realize that; but that is the trouble with many men of your type. Your opinion is motivated by dollars, dividends, and profits. Our desire for neutrality is motivated by a passion for peace, and in the interests of the youth and the homes of America."

I realize full well that the application of a neutrality program, extending embargoes to include all commercial transactions with belligerents, will hurt our industries and result in great pressure being exerted to modify the program. But when the issue is between the temporary loss of business and profits on the one hand and the participation of the United States in a foreign war, calling for great sacrifice of human life and vast economic and financial losses, which always follow in the aftermath of war, there can be no question where lies the path of wisdom.

Recall, please, the epoch of 1917–19—that period of our participation in the World War; many great fortunes were made in this country by individuals and by corporations. Labor was in demand. There were jobs for all. Wages were high and profits were great. That was an artificial prosperity created by war. But over and against this pleasing situation, on the other side of the ledger, must be placed the results which accrued in the aftermath of that war, culminating in the depression of 1929 and 1930, when the fortunes which were made were largely dissipated, when hundreds of thousands of American boys were hospitalized and justly applied for compensation to the Government, when labor was walking the streets with 10,000,000 unemployed throughout the country, and the national debt greatly increased.

Under our neutrality program the business interests of the Nation may have to restrict and forego great potential profits, but such injuries are not to be compared with the injuries that are always the concomitant of war, human suffering, maimed and crippled bodies, broken families, and grief-stricken homes.

Given a neutrality law, which in the event of war is applied sincerely and effectively, yet it may well be that notwithstanding this, we shall be drawn into the conflict; but should such an unhappy result occur, we will have the satisfaction of knowing that we have made a courageous, honorable attempt to keep out of the mess.

Reverting again to the address of the President last Friday night, I cannot refrain from pointing out that while he called for peace and recommended neutrality legislation, his faith in such agencies does not seem well grounded, for in his Budget message he has called for a tremendous increase in appropriations for Army and Navy. His Budget calls for defense appropriations of 938 millions, in great contrast to 534 millions in 1935, an increase of over 400 millions. The annual cost of maintaining these two branches of service will this year then be nearly a billion dollars.

It may well be that an honest, far-reaching neutrality program may be more effective in net beneficial results to the country than reliance exclusively on machines and munitions, the only use of which is to participate in armed conflict.

Of old, one said, "Follow after the things that make for peace." The injunction is laid upon us, and thoughtful men and women throughout the Nation may rejoice that never before has our Nation been so articulate for peace as today.

By Mr. WOODRUFF: Petition containing 129 names from Tenth Michigan District, favoring adoption of legislation extending the time of all existing star-route mail contracts and increasing the compensation thereon to an equal basis with that paid for other forms of mail transportation to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JANUARY 14, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father, that there is in this great wondrous, yet blind, world a presiding Deity named Love. We thank Thee that He will carry us through the night and the flood to the shore of untroubled hearts. Wherever there is nobility, patience, sweetness, and goodness; wherever there is heroism among men, and whatever there is of good report, we praise Thee that these virtues are of Thee, the eternal and universal Father. Be Thou a providence unto all in our country who are wrestling against cold and hunger and want. Open the hearts of all men that they may remember the brotherhood that is between man and man. In the name of Jesus we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

CONSTRUCTION OF A 300-TON AIRSHIP FOR MILITARY SERVICE

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 2, 1935, printed a brief concerning the construction and operation of two large American commercial airships in trans-Atlantic service, as provided in bill H. R. 2744, which was introduced by my former colleague, the Honorable Francis B. Condon, now a justice of the Supreme Court of Rhode Island.

At that time Members of both the House and Senate had indicated a sufficient interest in this bill to, in my judgment, have secured its approval had it been brought to the floor for action.

The publication of the brief in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD attracted wide attention. The fact that American airship failures have been with airships constructed upon foreign design has served to emphasize the fact that our American structural and aerodynamic engineers, who are recognized as highest world authorities, have not been given a chance to design and construct large American airships. Is it possible that Members of Congress lack faith in American inventive and engineering ability?

The strength, safety, and durability of an airship depends chiefly upon the structural frame employed. The German design is based on the arch-bridge type frame, and the frame to be employed in the construction of the American-designed airships, contemplated in bill H. R. 2744, is of the suspension-bridge type frame.

It requires no expert knowledge to decide between these two types of engineering design where the greatest strength in proportion to weight is required. The suspension bridge must be the preferred structural type for airships and is so approved by America's foremost structural engineers.

The commercial airship is already demonstrated to be the safest and most practical means for economical long-distance overseas transportation, at greater speed than is possible to achieve with the surface vessel. Its flight of many thousands of miles without refueling establishes it also to be relatively as speedy as heavier-than-air craft which must delay for weather conditions and have convenient landing ports en route. The airship has the further advantage of large pay load and of lower transportation cost; it has also a 100-percent safety record and schedule performance in strictly commercial service.

With these facts, which are well established, why should we delay? We now have the opportunity of starting a new great American industry which would give immediate and future employment in many other industries that supply the materials required for airship construction; we need to increase our foreign commerce, and here we have a future major form of transportation with which we can reach the world markets, with direct service through the air, even to the interior cities of the Orient.

There is another valuable feature of these airships, as explained in the brief published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which prompts me to introduce a bill in Congress for the construction and test of a large commercial airship that may be capable of transporting and servicing a squadron of 20 military airplanes at 20,000-foot altitude, thus supplying a much-desired protection of our country from attack by enemy airplanes in event of war.

We build airplane carriers to serve with our Navy, and these cost about $30,000,000 for one vessel capable of transporting and servicing 70 airplanes. With a like sum, I am informed, 7 great airships may be constructed to transport and service 140 airplanes, not at sea level but high up in the sky where they would be most needed, if they are ever required for military defense of our seacoast or interior cities.

I urge that Congress may take up the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 2744 and the new bill which I now introduce, for in every commercial airship we may build we may have a very valuable military weapon for the defense of our Nation, and we should no longer delay in providing for their construction.

Congress is now considering means to avoid being drawn into future conflicts, and for this reason is making provision for enlarging our military, naval, and heavier-than-air forces. The great airship, when properly designed and equipped with airplanes and guns for defense, may eventually develop to be of major military value, and we should not allow the result of our failures with foreign-designed airships to influence our judgment of what might be accomplished by American engineers. We should give our American engineers an opportunity to demonstrate what they can do, not only for military defense but also for commercial overseas service.

A bill authorizing construction of a 300-ton airship for military service subject to the acceptance by the United States Government

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of demonstrating the military value of the large commercial airships for transporting and servicing military airplanes as a means for protecting our Nation from attack by heavier-than-air craft the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to provide the sum of $6,000,000 as a loan to the Respess Aeronautical Engineering Corporation for the purpose of constructing an airship employing the American design suspension-bridge type frame, to be completed within a period of 2 years and to have the following specifications: The airship shall be capable of lifting 300 tons when its gas bags are 85 percent filled with helium gas; to have a maximum speed of not less than 120 miles per hour; to be equipped with and be able to transport and service 20 military airplanes that may be designed for exclusively airplane airship service; to be equipped with long-range rapid-fire guns to cover every angle of approach to the airship; to be able to operate at 20,000 feet altitude with full equipment and supplies with a crew of 100 men; and to be able to carry fuel for a range of 6,000 miles service at cruising speed with full military equipment and supplies. When the airship is completed and ready for testing a board shall be appointed by the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War to direct and supervise such tests, and should the airship tests, in the opinion of the board, fulfill the requirements of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall accept delivery of the airship and its equipment from the Respess Aeronautical Corporation as full payment for the loan. In event the airship is not accepted by the board, then the Respess Aeronautical Engineering Corporation shall convert the airship for commercial service, and may pay the loan over a period of 10 years in equal annual payments: Provided, however, That constant full insurance shall be carried by the Respess Aeronautical Engineering Corporation to cover replacement in event of fire, damage, or loss of the airship from any cause whatsoever. Further, the Secretary of the Navy is authorized and directed to provide the use of the dock at Sunnydale, Calif., or at Lakehurst, N. J., for the construction and testing the airship and for conversion to commercial use if required. It is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $6,000,000 to carry out the purpose of this act, and in the event the airship is not accepted by the United States Government, any repayments on account of the loan hereunder granted shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States and be credited to miscellaneous receipts.

A TRIBUTE TO MAJ. FRANK NORTH AND CAPT. LUTHER H. NORTH, FAMOUS NEBRASKA INDIAN FIGHTERS AND TRAIL BLAZERS

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I take the floor at this time to pay my tribute to the memory of Maj. Frank North and Capt. Luther H. North, American soldiers, Pawnee Scouts, and blazers of trails upon which the present generation rides in luxurious automobiles and streamlined railroad cars. Trails which have a story of human sacrifice, American heroism, romance, adventure, and valuable history. Trails which today have become great tourist highways. Trails which reveal the struggles of our early pioneers and soldiers.

Major North and Captain North were among our last surviving western characters, and in my humble effort to keep alive American traditions and history of our early American scouts and pioneers I have introduced a bill in this House of Representatives, H. R. 8079, authorizing the erection of memorial statues of these famous scouts. To better acquaint Members of the House with the history of these two famous men, and to urge passage of my bill, I give the following brief history of these two famous Americans.

MAJ. FRANK NORTH

Maj. Frank North died March 14, 1885, at Columbus, Nebr. He was born in Richland County, Ohio, March 10, 1840. Nebraska was his home from 1855. Columbus remained his residence from the time his family settled there in 1858 until his passing. His most active years were spent upon the western plains, including 2 or 3 years he was in partnership with William F. Cody on a cattle ranch at the head of the Dismal River in the sand hills. His last resting place is in the Columbus Cemetery in the shadow of evergreen trees and near the resting place of other members of the North family.

Major North and his Pawnee Scouts were the most important element in the defense of the western frontier from 1865 until the close of the plains Indian war by the surrender of Chief Crazy Horse at Fort Robinson in May 1877. It was the genius of Major North which effectively organized, first a company and then a battalion, of Pawnee warriors in United States service against their hereditary enemies, the hostile Sioux and Cheyenne.

The contribution of Major North to the defense of the American frontier may without exaggeration be regarded as the most important contribution of any one individual to the ending of the border wars, the completion of the Union Pacific Railroad, the white settlement of the region between the Missouri River and the Rocky Mountains, and the development of that country into a region of farm homes and ranches, flourishing cities, and one of the great irrigation centers of the United States.

Frank North became clerk and interpreter at the Pawnee Indian Agency at Genoa, Nebr., in 1861. He mastered the Pawnee language, becoming, in the opinion of those best qualified to judge, the most competent white man in his knowledge of the language and the customs of the tribe. This training with the confidence which he inspired among the Pawnee equipped him for his great opportunity in life—leadership at the head of the Pawnee warriors and a long series of victories over the hostile tribes which hastened the establishment of peace upon the border.

The career of Major North, condensed into few words, includes his command of the Pawnee company and battalion, effective scouting against the hostiles during the years which followed the organization of a company in 1865; chasing the hostiles from the construction forces of the Union Pacific Railroad; defeat of the Cheyennes under Chief Turkey Leg; defeat of the Arapahoes under Chief Black Bear in northern Wyoming; the defeat of the Cheyenne under Chief Tall Bull July 12, 1869, and the killing of Tall Bull in battle by Major North himself. This defeat of Tall Bull's band ended the first section of the plains war. The Nebraska Legislature passed a vote of thanks especially mentioning Major North and the Pawnee Scouts and their services.

In the second part of the plains war Major North with his Pawnee Scouts made an all night march from their camp on the Running Water surprising Chief Red Cloud's camp at Chadron Creek, capturing the entire camp without firing a shot, disarming the Sioux and marching them in to Fort Robinson.

The final achievement of Major North and his Pawnee Scouts was locating the hostile Cheyenne camp under Dull Knife in a remote hidden valley of the Big Horn Mountains. After a night march Major North led his Pawnee scouts through a narrow defile, surprising the Cheyenne camp, utterly destroying their winter homes and provisions. These bravest of the hostile Indians were thus compelled to surrender at Fort Robinson, where they enlisted in the United States service. The ultimate result of this remarkable achievement was the surrender of Chief Crazy Horse in May 1877, the flight of Chief Sitting Bull and his hostile bands to Canada, and the end of the Sioux-Cheyenne Indian wars.

At the close of the Indian wars Major North engaged with W. F. Cody—Buffalo Bill—in cattle ranching on the Dismal River in the sandhills. His career as a ranchman is characteristic of his career as a leader of scouts. In 1882 the people of Platte County elected Major North for the Nebraska Legislature where he served one term.

Major North was the outstanding Nebraskan of the frontier period and his achievements deserve commemoration in the most enduring form. Joined with him in these distinguished services on the American frontier was his brother, Capt. Luther H. North. The record of these two are united in the annals of heroic leaders in the great West.

CAPT. LUTHER H. NORTH

Capt. Luther H. North, born in Richland County, Ohio, March 6, 1836; came to Nebraska with his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas J. North, in 1855; United States mail carrier in 1859; soldier in Company K, Second Nebraska Cavalry, in 1862–63 under Col. Robert W. Furnas; took part in Sioux Indian campaign and in battle at White Stone Hill in Dakota; drove freighting wagons from Omaha to Fort McPherson in 1864 through hostile Indian country.

When his brother, Maj. Frank North, raised the battalion of Pawnee Scouts in 1867, Luther became captain of Company D. He had an active part in the frontier wars against the hostile Sioux and Cheyenne Indians until the final surrender of Chief Crazy Horse at Fort Robinson in May 1877. He was a scout with Gen. George A. Custer in the first military exploration of the Black Hills in 1874, and with his own eyes saw the first gold dust washed from the waters in the Black Hills.

Among the noted achievements of the Pawnee Scouts in which Capt. Luther H. North participated are the defeat of the Cheyennes under Tall Bull at Summit Springs, near the Nebraska-Colorado line, on July 12, 1869; the night march of 60 miles from the Niobrara River to Chadron Creek and the surprise capture of Red Cloud and Red Leaf's camps on the morning of October 24, 1876; the night march and surprise capture of hostile Cheyennes under Dull Knife on Crazy Woman's Fork in Wyoming November 26, 1876, resulting in the destruction of the camp, followed by the surrender of the hostile Sioux in 1877 at Fort Robinson.

For 13 years Maj. Frank North and Capt. Luther H. North, with the cooperation of the Pawnee Scouts trained under them, were the chief defense of the Nebraska frontier against the hostile plains Indians. The Pawnee Scouts made possible the construction of the Union Pacific Railroad in the time allotted. They opened up for pioneer cattlemen the western half of Nebraska, since no settlement was possible until the hostile Indians were forced to surrender. The Pawnee Scouts had the almost unbelievable record during the 13 years of border warfare and scores of hand-to-hand conflicts with the hostile Sioux and Cheyenne Indians of losing only one of their entire force.

On March 2, 1870, the Nebraska Legislature by a formal resolution voted its thanks to General Carr, of the Fifth Cavalry, and to Maj. Frank North and the Pawnee Scouts, in which Captain North was serving, for distinguished service in protecting the Nebraska frontier settlers and driving the hostile Indians from the country.

During the 57 years since he retired from the campaigns of the Pawnee Scouts, Captain North has been an exemplary citizen of Columbus; modest; loyal to his family and friends; the firm friend of Indian tribes; honored and sought for his friendship by historians and frontiermen; honored with the Distinguished Service Medal of the Lincoln Kiwanis Club in 1930; honored by the people of western Nebraska in his last tour of the old battlefield and camps in June 1933; honored by his fellow citizens upon his eighty-eighth birthday celebration, March 6, 1934; mustered out of life April 18, 1935; the last survivor of the Grand Army of the Republic at Columbus. His life was full of service to his State and his country; his example one of inspiration in war and in peace.

The Nebraska Legislature, fiftieth session, records this tribute to the memory of the last of the Great Plains fighting scouts. The history of his achievements and that of his brother, with whom he was joined in so many campaigns, will form one of the most thrilling chapters of Nebraska history throughout the years. (The foregoing history of these famous Nebraskans was gathered by A. E. Sheldon, of the Nebraska Historical Association.)

Columbus, the home of these famous men and the location proposed for the erection of these monuments, is one of Nebraska's most beautiful cities. The Pawnee Park, the park which would be an ideal location for these monuments, is one of the show places of Nebraska, covering more than 100 acres, beautifully landscaped. The grounds were acquired in 1920 and have been beautified by planting of more than 1,800 trees and shrubs.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House may be given permission to sit this week during sessions of the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did the gentleman say "this week"?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. That is what I said.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Would not the gentleman confine his request to this afternoon?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I make the request because we might have another rush tomorrow. The gentleman from Massachusetts will be advised, and I shall counsel with him about any other hearings. I am simply making this request to aid us in conducting our hearings.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. We have been working every morning during the past week, and I would not object to the request for this afternoon, but I would be constrained to object to anything further.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Then I will confine the request to this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs may sit this afternoon during sessions of the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be granted sufficient time to read an article on the Supreme Court's ruling with respect to the A. A. A. which appeared in the Daily News of Tuesday, January 7, 1936.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, from previous consultations I have had with the majority leader, it has been my understanding we are going to go into general debate at once and that would be the appropriate time for any Member to address the House, and for that reason I object.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1937

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9863) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill shall continue throughout the day, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] and myself.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am not sure just what the request involves; but on this side we have requests for time which would carry us a little further than throughout the day. It has been my understanding that we were to have general debate for 2 days this week, and I hope, therefore, it may be possible to let the general debate run through tomorrow, perhaps.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, in that connection, may I make this statement? We have already had general debate for a portion of an afternoon on this bill. If debate runs through today, it was my hope that we could finish general debate today with the exception of my speech and the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts on the bill. This will take a couple of hours tomorrow. If we can begin the reading of the bill by the middle of the afternoon tomorrow, we ought to pass it Thursday; and this will give us an opportunity to take up the deficiency bill Friday, which it is necessary to pass this week. If we can get cooperation, we can pass that bill Friday and then adjourn over Saturday.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SNELL. It has been generally understood that if we did not make requests to speak out of order there would be ample time given in general debate. There are several people over here—I am not one of them—who desire to make speeches at this time on the state of the Union. I am perfectly frank in stating that. I believe we ought to be allowed a little more than 1 day of general debate. The other afternoon when we had general debate, as the gentleman knows, nobody was ready, and we did not get very far. I think we ought to let the debate run along today and not make any definite arrangement for closing the debate.

Mr. WOODRUM. My request did not involve any definite arrangement for closing general debate, but I may state to the gentleman that we feel it is necessary to pass a deficiency bill this week. Next Monday is Consent Calendar day and the following day is Private Calendar day, and if we do not get the deficiency bill passed this week, it will be Wednesday of next week before we can take it up, and it will be the latter part of the week before we can pass it.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, I do not know what the urgency is with respect to the deficiency bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentleman that there will be another appropriation following my bill, and an opportunity will be given then for general debate.

Mr. SNELL. That is true, but there are certain speeches that gentlemen want to make at the beginning of the session, as the gentleman well knows.

Mr. WOODRUM. We will have 4 or 5 hours today, and you can do a lot of talking in that time.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that, but there are a number of people who want to talk on this bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. I think if the gentleman will cooperate and not make them too long, a lot of people can make speeches in this time.

Mr. SNELL. So far as I am individually concerned, I will cooperate, but I cannot agree to cutting off debate at this time unless you vote it on us.

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say that there is no disposition on this side to stop Members from talking.

Mr. SNELL. That is exactly what I understood, and that is why I have asked the gentleman to let general debate run along today.

Mr. WOODRUM. My request did not close debate, but merely provided for general debate today. However, I was telling the gentleman what I hoped might be done, that we might pass this bill Thursday. If there is not much controversy over the bill, we can perhaps read the bill in 2 or 3 hours.

Mr. SNELL. I do not know, but I presume that is true. If the gentleman simply makes the request that general debate run along today, there will be no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is the only request I have made.

Mr. SNELL. And I hope the gentleman will be generous tomorrow also.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman will always try to be accommodating.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BOLAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 9863

A bill making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

THE FARM CRISIS UNDER THE SUPREME COURT DECISION

Mr. GRAY of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, we are face to face with a crisis and an emergency to be met under the Supreme Court decision invalidating title I of the Farm Relief or Recovery Act. The farmers have reduced their crops under contracts to be reimbursed from the collection of the processing taxes, and unless they are paid as agreed they will suffer great and irreparable loss of earnings and income, and the proceeds from their farm, and for which they are in no wise at fault or responsible.

Regardless of what may be our views of principles and policies of farm relief, the Government must keep faith with the farmers, and this money should be provided and made available to them promptly, without hesitation or delay, to meet their obligations and from which to live.

HOW THE MONEY TO BE PROVIDED

The problem of financing for these payments raises a question of means and methods, and the first is always a bond issue, and a bankers' loan is already imminent providing for long and deferred maturity and calling for interest to be paid, which in time always equals the money borrowed.

The amount required to meet these payments, due and coming due after the allotment contracts in all, will require a half billion dollars, and increasing the debt by like amount with interest provided to accrue, the obligation will be doubled and the public debt increased to a billion.

But happily for Congress, the taxpayer, and the farmers other means and sources are immediately available at hand under and from which to provide the money without an interest-bearing bond issue to double the obligations of government. And these are already authorized and provided within other and remaining valid parts of the Farm Recovery Act itself.

A BILL TO AUTHORIZE THE PAYMENT

To meet the crisis and emergency brought by the Supreme Court decision, I am filing a bill today to authorize the payment to farmers of the full amounts due and coming due under their benefit contracts, and providing as follows:

A bill to provide for certain benefit payments to farmers who have made crop-adjustment agreements with the Secretary of Agriculture or have reduced production in contemplation of such agreement

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized and appropriated the sum of $500,000,000, or so much thereof as may be required, for the purpose—

That said sum shall be available to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of making benefit payments which may now be or which may become hereafter due and payable on crop-adjustment agreements entered into with the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

That such funds will also be available for the payment of such benefits to farmers who have applied to such Administration for such contract prior to January 6, 1936, and who have in good faith made reductions in acreage and otherwise complied with the rules and regulations promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture looking to such crop program, regardless of whether such contract had actually been signed and delivered to such Administration.

A RESOLUTION TO PROVIDE THE MONEY

And to make the money appropriated and necessary and required for such payment promptly available for use, I am filing the following resolution calling upon the President to exercise the powers conferred under title III of the Farm Relief Act, which will obviate a bond issue and the payment of interest:

Concurrent resolution to require the exercise of certain delegated powers

Whereas Congress on the 12th day of May 1933 enacted certain provisions of legislation to relieve the national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power and by other means and methods particularly enumerated; and

Whereas such legislation enactments, under title I of said act, provided for certain crop-reduction operations and for the levy and collection of certain taxes necessary and incident to the administration thereof; and

Whereas, by further provisions of said act and under and by virtue of title 3 thereof, certain currency operations were provided for, authorized under clause 5, section 8, article 1, of the Constitution, whereby, likewise, to restore farm values and prices with certain discretionary powers conferred upon the President of the United States; and

Whereas following such enactment the provisions under title 1 thereof were duly entered upon for administration while leaving the currency provisions of title 3 thereof withheld from administration; and

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States has decreed the provisions of said title 1 to be in contravention of the Constitution and leaving the provisions of title 3 thereof in full force and valid as law; and

Whereas there has been no exercise of the powers conferred upon the President under said title 3, and the same remains awaiting administration and enforcement: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in pursuance of and in obedience to the purpose and intention of Congress in conferring upon the President of the United States certain powers under and by virtue of section 43 of an act of Congress entitled "An act to increase agricultural purchasing power, and for other purposes", approved May 12, 1933, the same being power primarily vested in Congress under article 1, section 8, clause 5, of the Constitution, the President of the United States be, and is hereby, directed to proceed in the immediate exercise of such conferred powers, to cause the remonetization of silver, or the revaluation of gold, or the restoration of the volume and supply of money by resort to the instrumentalities of the Federal Reserve System, if the powers thereof can be invoked in the exercise of positive governmental force and without the delay and uncertainty of obtaining the "assent" of the Federal Reserve Board and banks, or by causing to be issued United States non-interest-bearing currency notes, or by the concurrent exercise of all of said powers conferred, all as provided for in said act, and accordingly as one or the other of such currency means and agencies can be invoked or resorted to under such delegation of powers, to restore agricultural values and prices, and accomplish the object and purpose of such provisions of said act most promptly, speedily, and without delay.

THE RELIEF ACT IN THREE PARTS

The Farm Relief or Recovery Act was provided or enacted in three parts for separate administration and enforcement—the first part of the act in title I to restore farm earnings and income by reducing farm crop reduction; another part, as title II, of the act to refinance farm debts and mortgages. And still another part is title III, for separate and independent administration, was included as a part of the law whereby to replenish the depleted money supply and raise prices on normal farm production without restriction or limitation of farm crops.

Only one part of the Relief Act, title I, the part providing for crop reduction and the assessments of processing taxes, has been declared invalid by the Supreme Court, and this, the part and title only which was borrowed from and recommended by the Federal Farm Board and disapproved by the people speaking in the 1932 election, 3 years before the fatal Supreme Court blow.

Other parts of the Farm Relief Act, including the currency provisions under title III, not only remain in full force unimpaired under the decision of the Supreme Court but stand upon the statute books awaiting immediate administration and enforcement by the exercise of power by the President.

NO NEW LEGISLATION REQUIRED

Title III of the Farm Relief Act is not dead but only sleeping, only reposing in a comatose dormant state, awaiting the call of Gabriel's trumpet to awake its powers and provisions for farm recovery and relief, like the souls of men to break slumber in the great resurrection morn. Title III remains under the Constitution a valid, enforceable, continuing law. Title III remains upon the statute books in full force and effect for administration not only to pay the amounts due the farmers now but to restore agricultural purchasing power, for reform, and to remedy the cause of the panic, and to safeguard against future depressions.

No new legislation is necessary or required to provide full payment now due the farmers. The law is already on the statute books. Title III of the Farm Relief Act only awaits the exercise of power by the President, and the money can be authorized today and made available to the farmers tomorrow. And if the President, under title III, will act to issue United States currency notes as fully authorized and empowered to act, no interest obligation will be incurred. The public debt will be increased only one-half billion, and instead a billion of bankers' interest will be saved to the taxpayers of the country.

FARM RELIEF HAS NOT FAILED

Title III has not failed under the Constitution. In the crucial test before the courts its powers have been upheld and sustained by repeated Supreme Court decisions under clause 5, section 8, article I, of the Constitution as valid and enforceable enactments of law. And title III has not failed of the purpose for which the law was intended and enacted. Title III has not failed to restore farm prices. Title III has not failed to restore farm earnings. Title III has not failed to restore the buying and consuming power of the agricultural population. Title III has not failed to restore the tax-paying power nor the interest, debt, or mortgage-paying power of farm crops and stock for which it was provided.

Title III of the Farm Relief Act has never been allowed to operate. Its powers have never been invoked. Its provisions have never been permitted to function. Its powers have been withheld from administration while manipulating bankers and financiers have juggled and manipulated the people's money. The virtues of title III of the Farm Relief Act and its powers and provisions under which to reverse the secret currency operations which brought on this crisis and which it has held upon the country have been left wasting in the desert air of a closed book and a lapse of time.

FORMER EFFORTS FOR ENFORCEMENT

On May 12, 1933, this farm-relief bill became a law, including title III, providing for such currency operations under separate and independent administration, with powers to be exercised by the President. On May 7, 1933, 5 days in advance and on anticipation of such enactment, I filed a statement with the President reciting the menacing conditions of agriculture and the imperative need or necessity of the prompt exercise of the powers vested in him under the provisions of the act.

Following the passage of the law and after waiting less than 30 days, and on the 6th day of June 1933, I filed Concurrent Resolution 22 with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, calling upon Congress, then in session, to require the exercise of the powers conferred on the President by title III.

TITLE III NEVER ENFORCED

While title I of the Farm Relief Act, providing for farm and crop stock reduction and for the imposition of a processing tax, was entered upon in record-breaking time and since continued with unremitting zeal, the day was not yet opportune for the administration of the currency provisions of title III, and the enforcement was witheld and left suspended.

Title II, to refinance farm loans, with vast sums of money from lenders, has likewise been promptly administered until a great swollen stream of interest is flowing to coffers of the secret investors. But title III still remains in status quo, with private bankers still issuing money, controlling its volume and taking the interest toll.

But title III of the Farm Relief Act, to unlock and enter the door of the sacred portals and secret rendezvous of the international bankers and manipulating financiers, of the misers, shylocks, and money changers, has been passed over in whispering silence, its provisions considered in bated breath lest the magic spell of confidence be broken with the private, manipulating bankers usurping the powers of Congress to issue and control money.

BEGINNING AGAIN WHERE I LEFT OFF

But since filing Concurrent Resolution 22 in 1933 I have maintained an abiding faith in the virtues of these currency provisions, not only to relieve immediate farm distress but to remedy the cause of the panic and safeguard a repetition of the disaster.

In filing this resolution here today I am beginning again where I left off in 1933. First, now to provide the emergency money to pay farmers for reducing their crops and ultimately and finally for resort to replenish the normal volume of money and restore agricultural purchasing power.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 6, 1933, on which date Concurrent Resolution No. 22 was filed, shows that I addressed the House appealing for the passage of the resolution, but my words and appeal fell upon dull and irresponsive ears, and time went on while title III remained without enforcement, a dead letter upon the statute books.

HIGHER PRICES FOR A FULL CROP

On the theory of trying out all plans offered, I have supported the A. A. A. program of restoring prices by farm-crop reduction while waiting patiently for currency relief to give farmers higher prices on a full crop for complete, adequate, and permanent relief.

Such adequate farm relief requires not only a restored price for a part crop but a restored price for a full crop upon which all taxes were based and upon which all farm debts and mortgages were contracted for payment and only upon which farmers can pay and live.

And all this can now be brought about promptly, speedily, and without delay by reversing the secret money operations, taking over one-half the currency out of circulation, first stealthily in 1920 and again in 1929, causing a fall of all values, prices, and wages, and bringing on this panic, or depression.

This measure for remedy and farm relief is not only fully, completely, and particularly within the conceded powers of Congress, under article 1, section 8, clause 5, of the Federal Constitution, authorizing Congress to regulate the supply of money, but the law is already enacted as a part of the agricultural recovery measure and has remained since May 12, 1933, upon the statute books awaiting enforcement, and could be carried into effect tomorrow to maintain farm prices even higher than the part now declared unconstitutional.

ALL PRICES MUST RISE TOGETHER

This would restore and bring up on an even level all values, all prices, and all wages, so that those who pay more would have more to pay with, restoring and maintaining the buying and consuming power at all times equal with production, and bringing back prosperity with all the blessings of plenty and great abundance.

In fact, the most direct and positive provisions of the farm relief or recovery act remain on the statute books unimpaired, admitted, conceded, and unchallenged, as a valid and constitutional measure, with only the international bankers and money changers to hold it back and postpone its enforcement.

WHY ENFORCE ONE PART AND NOT ANOTHER

Why should this part of the farm-relief law be ignored and left unadministered when all parts were passed by Congress with the understanding, assurance, and pledge that all would be given equal force and effect and administered concurrently together as one complete relief measure?

It would be unbelievable, unthinkable, a reflection upon the good faith of Congress in the enactment of legislation to say these parts of the farm-relief provisions, now remaining valid for enforcement, solemnly considered and approved by the vote of Congress and the signature of the President, without any good faith, purpose, and intentions to be entered upon, enforced, and carried out to accomplish the purpose for which enacted. And if so solemnly considered and approved, what reason can be given or apology offered for such disregard and failure of enactment?

A proper vindication and exoneration of Congress and a good-faith policy of administration, now that the trial and experimental parts have been declared invalid and unenforceable, requires that these currency provisions solemnly considered, approved, and signed should be entered upon without delay and administered to a logical conclusion.

GOOD AND BAD MONEY

This money with the obligation of the Government behind it, with all the wealth and property behind it, with three-fourths of the gold behind it to redeem and make it good, is at first only base money, "flat money", "printing-press money", inflationary and dangerous money. Until the Government turns over the money to the private manipulating bankers, charging them less than one-third of 1 percent for the bankers to loan back to the Government the same identical money, the same identical bills and paper at 3-percent and 4-percent interest. And then suddenly by a mysterious transition of the character and intrinsic value of wealth, this money is changed from bad to good money and declared under the high-sounding claim of "currency reform", "sound money", and an "honest dollar."

INTEREST ON FICTITIOUS MONEY

Under this jugglery and claim the bankers of the country are collecting and the people are paying billions for the use of their own money. But they are not only collecting interest on all the peoples' money and on every dollar in existence, by a fiction and form of banking they are collecting interest from the people upon billions of money which has no existence. There is only some five billions of money in existence, use, and circulation all told, yet by this strategic fiction and form under which bankers create fictitious money, by loaning $10 for every $1 in the bank, they are collecting interest from the people not on mere five billions of dollars but upon multiplied billions of dollars of fictitious currency.

A COLOSSAL AND GIGANTIC FRAUD

Taking advantage of religious beliefs and the mysteries of life and existence and assuming the role of the supernatural, many great and flagrant frauds and deceptions have been perpetrated and afflicted upon the confiding and unsuspecting people of the world, whereby to take from them their earnings and income, their substance and property. But the money illusion, the complex intricacies of currency and its operations in serving as a medium of exchange, as a measure of value, and as a form of evidence of wealth and of representing property and the products of labor, for the long lapse of time perpetrated, for the number of people misled and deluded, for the amount of property and wealth taken from or withheld from the people, the illusions and deceptions of money is the most colossal and gigantic fraud of all the ages and time recorded in the annals of history of the relations of men.

IF THESE POWERS WERE EXERCISED

If the powers and provisions of title III of the Farm Recovery or Relief Act were now entered upon, first to provide the emergency money to pay for crop reduction and then followed in good faith administration to replenish the depleted money supply, to restore earnings, and income and the buying and consuming power, the effect upon the country would be like magic. The doors of factory, mill, and workshop would swing open, stand ajar, the wheels of industry would start, the whir of machinery in motion, the din of saw and hammer would sing the song of real prosperity amid the glad hosannas and rejoicings of 120,000,000 people. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I propose to offer for the consideration of the House a few comments suggested by President Roosevelt's speech on the state of the New Deal which he delivered before a joint session of Congress on the evening of January 3.

Let me say at once that in doing this I shall try not to disturb the pure spirit of Mr. Farley, who is universally recognized as probably the whitest political lily ever nurtured in the Tammany tradition since Boss Tweed went to jail. I agree with Mr. Farley in his abhorrence of political dirt, in his distaste for being hit below the belt, and especially in his grief over even the imaginary existence of that vast and tainted "slush fund" with which "entrenched greed" and certain small but wicked "minorities of autocrats" still at large outside the New Deal are plotting to further enslave the people during the Presidential campaign.

Although in this discussion I may have to disagree with certain portions of the President's address, I trust that neither he nor his devoted followers among my honored colleagues will class my humble suggestions with that "haughty and sterile intellectualism", that "musty reaction", that "hollow and outworn traditionalism" which in his Mayflower Hotel speech he told the cross section from the "common people"—assembled there at $50 a plate—had plagued his great forerunner and exemplar Andrew Jackson just as they are plaguing Andrew Jackson's admitted reincarnation in the person of Mr. Roosevelt today.

The speech of January 3 was framed in two sections. Section 1 appeared in the guise of a discourse on neutrality—a subject of surpassing interest and importance at the present time. But the real meat in this half of the coconut consists of an unneutral and irritating attack upon political autocracy as it is now functioning with or without the consent of the people in various European countries.

The second half of the speech, using the first half as an argumentative springboard, consisted in an attack upon unnamed and nebulous private "autocracy" supposed to be functioning here and now in our own country, not only for the purpose of "enslaving the people" but, worse still, for the more malign and dangerous purpose of defeating the New Deal in the coming Presidential election.

Even the most prejudiced partisan must have marked a curious inconsistency between the two main divisions of the speech. In the first and what may be described as the foreign half, the President registered strong disapproval of our European "good neighbors" fighting among themselves, and especially for fighting at the instigation of autocrats.

In what we may call the domestic half of his speech, the President urged the waging of "unceasing warfare" between classes here at home among our own people. Unbroken peace abroad. Unceasing war at home is one of the most weird and devastating doctrines yet proclaimed by the New Deal.

A few months ago one of the President's most prominent New Deal spokesmen and advisers, Professor Tugwell, of blessed memory, made a speech on the Pacific coast. In that speech Mr. Tugwell, in true Russian fashion, exhorted American farmers and workers to join forces, to keep their indignation hot, and to wage unrelenting warfare against that dangerous and despicable group of American citizens who, inspired by "entrenched greed", still persist in their nefarious plotting by creating and developing industries and jobs and pay envelopes for the "enslavement of the people."

This practically identical encouragement of class warfare among our people by the President of the United States and by one of his high official advisers has an ominous sound, if it is an indication of what we may expect in the coming campaign.

Apart from its inconsistencies, the most striking feature of the President's speech was its omissions. What he did not say was of far greater interest, pitch, and moment than what he did say.

For instance, he did not name those dangerous American "autocrats" whom he accuses of seeking to enslave our people. Just as in his Atlanta speech he neglected to name the bankers who had advised him that our country could safely stand a public debt of from fifty-five to seventy billions of dollars.

How are even the most impractical, devoted, and heroic of New Dealers going to "wage unceasing warfare" against these dangerous autocrats now working their nefarious plots against regimentation, wild and wasteful spending, and other characteristic forms of New Deal liberty here at home if the President, who assuredly must know, will not tell them who these enemies are?

Omission no. 2 is even more puzzling. Why in an address, which he assured us was on "the state of the Union", did he neglect to deal with at least a few of the more pressing problems confronting our people today?

Why, for instance, did he not explain and defend the accumulation of some twelve billions of a deficit, actual and estimated, during the 4 fiscal years of his administration? Why did he not deal with the fact that his administration will have spent in 4 years close to thirty billions of money which somebody, somehow, sometime will have to pay? Why did he not explain why his administration in 4 years will have spent at least six billions more than the twenty-four billions which our Federal Government spent for all purposes, including four wars, from 1789 to 1913, a period of 124 years? Why did he not explain, defend, and justify the fact that at the end of his administration the public debt, including $4,530,000,000 of contingent liabilities, will reach the astronomical total of at least $35,000,000,000?

To be sure, the President did tell us that in spite of the economic and administrative chaos in which the New Deal is now enmeshed, we are "approaching a balanced Budget", and under present circumstances—which, of course, means the impending Presidential campaign—no new taxes are necessary or advisable.

This mythical approach to a balanced Budget, when the Government is actually spending $2 for every dollar of revenue it takes in, even borrowing money to pay interest on money already borrowed, may be more easily understood by the use of a simple illustration or two. You mathematicians are familiar with the formula known as the theory of limits. This interesting theory deals with the attempt to pass from one fixed point to another fixed point by halving the distance each time a move is made. The discouraging lesson taught by this experiment is that no matter how often you move only halfway in the right direction, you never can arrive at your desired destination.

For those of us who, like myself, may not be mathematicians, a simple and more concrete illustration will serve. A lad in school was set a sum in arithmetic by his teacher: "A cat fell into a well. She crawled out 1 foot every day and fell back 2 feet every night. How long would it take her to get out?" Johnny figured for a while. He covered his own slate and one borrowed from his seat mate. The teacher, watching his efforts, asked, "How are you getting on?" Johnny answered, "Teacher, please don't bother me; just give me one more clean slate and another half hour and I'll land that cat in hell."

Why did not the President, in what may be his last message to Congress on the state of the Union, explain just how far and for what reason he had scrapped the Democratic platform of 1932, upon which he was elected and the provisions of which he had solemnly pledged himself to enforce?

Why did he not at least attempt to explain, justify, and defend the fact that much of the New Deal legislation which he had forced through a cowed and complaisant Congress has been or will be declared unconstitutional?

True, he did assert that the New Deal had "established a new relation between Government and the people", but he failed to point out that the "new" aspect of this relationship consisted of un-American regimentation of the citizen by an arrogant bureaucracy much after the fashion of that European autocracy which he so properly condemned.

He did assert that in 34 months his administration had built up "new instruments of public power", which in his hands are "wholesome and proper", but which in any other hands, especially Republican, would mean "enslavement of the people." But he neglected to mention that most of these new instruments of public power were unconstitutional and that as soon as the N. R. A., which he held to be the cornerstone of the New Deal, was killed by the Supreme Court, fear diminished, confidence increased, and business began to improve.

The President did make the proud boast that the New Deal had "returned the control of the Federal Government to the city of Washington." But he failed to show us just how this new control functions.

Let us take one example:

In 1933 Mr. Wallace started in the Department of Agriculture with an organization of 26,132 employees. Up to the day that the Supreme Court laid the A. A. A. to rest beside the late lamented N. R. A., he had jumped this number to 66,969 full-time employees. The Civil Service Committee figures the average salary of these full-time Government employees at $150.50 per month. This means that the New Deal pays out of the taxpayers' money to this one group of full-time employees an annual salary of $120,824,916. In addition to this army of full-time employees, Mr. Wallace had organized a field force on part time of 115,366, drawing, according to the August report of the Civil Service Commission, an average of $38.32 per person a month. This makes a total in one department alone of 182,335, or 40,000 more than the standing Army of the United States.

While the Members of this House, elected as Democrats on a Democratic platform, were wildly applauding the President's presentation of the un-Democratic doctrines of the New Deal, I wondered just what it was that made them seem so eager to register at least the appearance of enthusiastic agreement with his views. Was it because they had ceased to be Democrats and had become New Dealers, along with the President and his un-Democratic advisers, the Frankfurters, the Cohens, the Corcorans, and the Tugwells? Or was it because of a recrudescence of that principle laid down long ages ago by a great prophet of Israel as the reason for the defection, degradation, and defeat of his people, "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib"? [Laughter and applause.]

In his address, delivered in the city of Atlanta a few weeks ago, the President made the statement that on the 4th day of March 1933 the mechanics of civilization had broken down. Did he mean by that sweeping statement that the engines and trains of our railroads were standing idle and empty, that all airplanes were grounded, all steamships tied up at the wharves, all automobiles standing still, not even enough of them running to kill our regular quota of a hundred citizens a day? Did he mean that the schools, churches, hospitals, and stores were closed and empty—that births and deaths were postponed, leaving the doctors, nurses, and undertakers unemployed? Did he mean that all telephones had quit ringing and all telegraph instruments had ceased to click? Did he mean that the buds on the Georgia peach trees were refusing to open? Whatever he had in mind, he most certainly meant to convey the impression that the day of his inauguration marked a new era in our national history. I am in accord with this belief of the President. Like all the world, we were in desperate straits. In the midst of our universal distress appeared the new Messiah, elected by a great nonpartisan vote of the people, holding in one hand the golden key of courage, confidence, and hope by which he proposed to unlock the doorway to better days, and in the other that sound and sane platform of the Democratic Party adopted in 1932 as the guide to which he had sworn absolute allegiance and obedience in undertaking his great task.

No President ever faced a more challenging situation. No President ever took office backed by such unanimous support of the citizens and public opinion.

During the first months of his administration his policies were in accord with that platform upon which he was elected and were supported by public opinion practically without regard to political affiliation, both in and out of Congress.

But something happened, so mysterious in its origin, so devastating in its results, that no one has yet been able to give it a name or to find for it a satisfactory explanation. The tried and trusted leaders of the Democratic Party were pushed aside and fell into oblivion. In their place there appeared beside the President groups of volunteer advisers hitherto unrecognized and unknown. These constituted the "brain trust", and out of the "brain trust" was born the departure of the administration from adherence to the American principles of the Democratic platform and entrance into the alien hodgepodge now known as the New Deal.

In order to understand the amazement, distress, and resentment caused among all types of citizens and in all sections of the country by the President's address of January 3, we must go back to those fateful days in the spring of 1933. There had swept over the civilized world a wave of unrest and reaction against existing economic and social conditions. Consciously or unconsciously the masses of men everywhere recognized that science had at last placed in the hands of men dominion over the forces and resources of nature, making it possible to produce more than enough of all the economic necessities of life to supply every normal need. Facing this fact, the world was disturbed by the fact that these needs were not being supplied. In other words, only one central problem confronted civilization then, and confronts it now; that is the problem of poverty, which means the unequal or unjust distribution of wealth; and this one central problem found then, and finds now, its chief expression in the tragedy of unemployment.

We might as well face the fact—for it is a fact—that this Nation and no nation can live long half unemployed and half employed. Unless we can successfully solve the problem of unemployment, civilization will surely crumble into ruin at the very hour of its greatest economic achievements.

There are only two possible solutions proposed in the modern world for this problem: One, in various degrees and of various names, is the European system, based upon the common principle of collectivism. The Russian answer to this problem is communism. The German answer is Hitlerism. The Italian answer is fascism. But in every one of these cases the masses of men have been forced to surrender their last vestige of political and social and economic liberty in exchange for a temporary, incomplete, and illusory economic security.

The second philosophy confronting the world-wide problem of unemployment is the American system and I hold that the American answer to this problem must not be the answer of Russia, Germany, Italy, or of any other civilization. It must be an American answer expressing the ideals, principles, and methods by which America for 150 years has been lifting the masses of men to a level of opportunity, comfort, and freedom never attained by any civilization since time began.

More than 2 years ago I made the assertion that the next great line-up in this country would be between American-minded people and alien-minded people. The problem of unemployment which confronts every home and every individual in our Nation today far transcends any party or section or interest. It is the one central problem of the whole people. It will not be solved by the Democrats, by the Republicans, by the New Dealers, nor by any alien-minded group no matter how vociferous they may become. It will be solved by the whole American people acting together in accordance with the Constitution which expressed the fundamental principles of our national life or it will not be solved at all.

This is why I consider the radical change in the program and policy of Mr. Roosevelt at the beginning of his administration, and again set forth in his speech of January 3, to be the major personal and political tragedy of our history. If he had then announced his invincible adherence to American principles as expressed in our Constitution, American standards as expressed in our economic life, and American ideals as expressed in our concept of liberty, he could have called to his side, and been assured of the cooperation of, the leaders in education, religion, business, finance, industry, labor, and agriculture. Under the stress of that hour all of these groups were in the mood to face the problem of unemployment as one common to them all, and I have faith enough in the intelligence and character of all these sections of our people to believe that under the leadership of the new President they would have found a common foundation and practical formula upon which and by which to rebuild a social and economic structure capable of finally removing the curse of unemployment and consequent poverty from our beloved country.

Instead of this great historic accomplishment, which would have placed America for generations in the lead of all societies of the world, what have we as revealed in the President's address on January 3?

We have revealed the subordination of the great central challenging problem of unemployment in the President's program to the perpetuation of a group of experimental, temporary, unworkable, and, in many cases, unconstitutional laws, dealing with secondary aspects of the real problem, but in no case offering a permanent solution or going to the root of the matter.

We have in this address no hint that the President realizes the fatal significance of the fact that, after 34 months of prodigal spending, after the creation in these months of a vast army of bureaucrats working for the most part at cross purposes in hopeless confusion, after the beginnings of a normal economic recovery by the action of regenerative forces resident in our economic structure itself and acting in spite of political meddling and muddling, after all this we still have some 10,000,000 of unemployed, and we have achieved no new understanding of the problem of unemployment, nor have we reached any common unity of policy or action among our citizens looking toward a final solution of the problem by American methods and on American principles.

It is these fundamental omissions in the President's speech which explain the unfavorable reaction among all classes and in all sections of the country to what was intended to be—expected to be—ought to have been and was not, a clarion call to the whole people to go forward to the final solution of their central problem under the leadership and inspiration of their Government, but not at the price of an ignominious surrender of their liberties and rights. [Applause.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, when the distinguished and very colorful gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON], just across the New York Harbor from me, started to talk, I had little intention of attempting, in my very feeble way, to answer him, but some of the comments he made prompted me to attempt to make a few remarks. It is not easy to do, however. First, the gentleman read from a prepared speech, to which was given the usual thought which he always gives to any appearance on the floor of this House. Furthermore, he spoke in the same manner in which he used to orate in my district when at times I sat at his feet, open-mouthed, inhaling the wisdom which he exuded. He did not wear a red cravat then as is his accustomed adornment now. Rather did he wear the somber garb of a cleric there on the East Side of New York, recognized as one of the most distinguished clergymen in the whole city of New York. It was at the Madison Avenue Baptist Church, between Twenty-ninth and Thirtieth Streets, I first knew him before he graduated to preside over the Rockefeller churches in Cleveland and way stations. On a Sunday night when it was raining, and all of the Catholic churches were closed, I often would go with a friend of mine to hear one of those great orations for which the Most Reverend Dr. EATON was so famous.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No; I do not want to yield.

Mr. EATON. Oh, could you not yield just once, John?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, yes; if you put it that way I cannot resist.

Mr. EATON. Ever since I have been in Congress and have watched with pride and joy the rapid rise of my friend who is now attempting to beat me up, I have been grieved to realize how small was the result of my ecclesiastical efforts in his behalf. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, yes; that is a subject we have often discussed in our friendly chats, but the gentleman having left that high calling and having become a great industrialist and a statesman, I did not feel obligated to present myself to him as a repentant sinner. [Laughter.]

The gentleman must have been harking back to those old days when I first knew him, when he returned to the tomb to talk about Tammany and "Boss" Tweed and even jail. How often have the citizens of the empire city listened to such denunciations. Those expressions were familiar from the pulpit in those days when the distinguished gentleman's leonine head, now beautifully platinumed, bore a hirsute adornment of raven black.

At the outset I want to correct a misstatement which the gentleman unintentionally uttered and which has been constantly repeated in the newspapers. It refers to my friend the distinguished Postmaster General, Mr. James A. Farley. The gentleman referred to him as a Tammany man, trained in Tammany, and brought up in Tammany. Both geographically and actually that is not the fact. I do not say that in any apologetic sense, because the building which is known as Tammany Hall is in my district, and our organization might well welcome Mr. Farley to our midst. Mr. Farley is, in fact, a Democrat from up-State New York who moved a few years ago into the Borough of Manhattan, in which borough the building Tammany Hall is located, and in which building the Democratic county committee—and the only Democratic organization in New York County—meets. Mr. Farley happened to move into New York County a few years ago after he had risen to the high position he now holds in Democratic politics. Incidentally, he resides and votes in the only usually regular Republican district in all New York City. Whether Mr. Farley is a member of the Tammany organization I do not know, but I do know he holds no prominence in that particular organization.

We have heard a lot about the recent Jackson Day dinner. I was at that dinner, which cost $50 a plate. Why, it was not worth the $5 that went for the dinner. [Laughter.] The remaining $45 went to pay off the party's indebtedness to the Raskobs and other American Liberty Leaguers. I was for that. The distinguished manager of candidates, Mr. FISH, on the floor that day spoke about the imported viands and the delicious vintages which would be served at the dinner. I regret to say that I saw none of them whatsoever. It was one of the driest, most uninteresting dinners I ever attended—except for the main speech. [Applause and laughter.]

I thought when the distinguished spokesman for the Republican Party, Mr. EATON, took the floor he was going to sound the keynote speech of this session for the campaign of next November; that he was going to review what has happened between the close of the last session and the opening of this in an attempt to put us on the defensive. Well, let me say, Mr. Chairman, if what the distinguished gentleman from New Jersey has said is the only attack—the only poison gas—that can be shot at us, why, we Democrats could right now go on vacation until next November and be back here reelected on January 3. [Applause.]

The gentleman complained about the President's message. He said he was one of the "mourners" on that night—scoffers others have called them. I remind him of Evangeline; maybe it will turn out that "those who came to scoff" may yet "remain to pray." He said, "omission no. 1", that the President did not name the interests which were seeking to destroy democracy in this country and were seeking a return of autocratic rule. Of course, the President did not have to name them. Everybody knew who they were. The next morning every newspaper in America carried the names of every one of these interests. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. The head of the Manufacturers Association had previously put the Manufacturers Association into the field of politics, and the head of the utilities had previous to that stated they were going to gang up; so they named themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. "Omission no. 2"—strange as it may seem, only two omissions were enumerated by the distinguished gentleman—he talked about the President failing to guarantee he would balance the Budget. You know, when I hear about this balancing the Budget from the minority side, I wonder why they do not tell us just how they are going to do it, because they had a great chance to do it and never came near it. Someone suggested that they might resort to that extremity of giving up the elephant as their symbol and adopting the trained seal, which can balance most anything—even a budget, possibly. [Laughter.]

I have read the sundry speeches of our ex-President, Mr. Hoover—my President for 4 now forgettable years—which he made by radio and other devices before we convened here this session.

He attacked this administration for its Federal centralization—shades of Hamilton—and 60 years of Republican rule.

He lamented the growth of bureaucracy. Can anyone forget those days from 1929 to 1933, when bureaus multiplied so fast we lost track of them?

He criticized us for repudiating Government obligations. This from the statesman who did so much to drive us into the depression by forgiving to many nations, especially his "dear old England", the war debts due us.

Mr. Hoover spoke of the world-wide depression—a constant alibi of the opponents of administration—which he said turned the corner—you remember that old "corner"—in June or July 1932. If it did turn the corner, we in Congress were not aware of it. I have often wondered at the audacity of the ex-President talking about balancing the Budget, criticizing this administration for not balancing the Budget, when he and his administration in the last 2 years before we took office piled up a deficit of $5,000,000,000. [Applause.] That deficit of $5,000,000,000 that he piled up is equal almost exactly to every dollar, every cent, we have actually spent on relief up to this good hour.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. As a matter of fact, in the last 3 years of his administration the deficit was a little over six billion, and we passed a tax bill raising $1,641,000,000, which, if that bill had not been passed, would have been nearly $8,000,000,000.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman yield for a brief sentence?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. EATON. As far as I am concerned, I will accept the chastisement and the gentleman can quit. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. "Chastisement" was the gentleman's profession for years. I always turn the other cheek.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for an observation there?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No. I must decline to yield further. I cannot possibly match my wits with the gentleman from Cape Cod.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not think you can when we speak about recoverable assets.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Well, I have a few remarks to make if the gentleman will permit me to go on. He may recover thereafter.

I was amused at that cat-in-the-well story of the prelate from New Jersey. You know it is so easy to forget. I lived through those 4 terrible years from 1929 to 1933. If the cat was down in the well he sure was slipping back 2 feet then for every foot he moved up, and there was no attempt by Mr. Hoover or by the Republican Party, then in power, to help the old feline get out. [Applause and laughter.]

Oh, the Republicans continue to boast of "their" Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Of course, that agency was not what it is today. The Hoover administration was very particular to see to it that the only institutions to which money should be loaned by the Government were the railroads, the insurance companies, the banks, and the mortgage companies. As far as I am concerned the gentleman from New Jersey may go to his people in Jersey next November at the election and just put to them this simple question: "How would you like to go back to March 1933?" [Applause.] I should like to ask his audiences this question: "Do you remember those days, Mr. Businessman, when you could not get any money out of the bank; when you could not cash a check; when business had fallen 60 percent; when after the failure of ten or eleven thousand banks during the last 4 years America had sunk to the lowest economic depths not only in the history of this Nation but of any nation at any time in the world?" If the mechanics of civilization had not broken down they were so near the breaking point that only a major operation or a complete overhauling could save them. [Applause.] And lo and behold, in spite of this, Mr. Hoover continues to say "their was no bank panic before 1933."

Oh, the gentleman from New Jersey used that old alibi about world-wide depression. He is truly a disciple of Mr. Hoover. He said we were in it like all the world. Why, there was no comparison in all the world with the economic abyss into which we had sunk on that stormy day of March 4, 1933. Other nations were comparably prosperous and safe. We were at the lowest of any nation at any time in all history. That was the picture we inherited from 4 years of "rugged individualism." [Applause.] Someone said, "We found about 15,000,000 ragged individuals."

The gentleman from New Jersey, that great agricultural State, laments that our great Agriculture Department has so many persons on its pay roll. A schoolboy could justify this expenditure compared with the increase of farmers' profits of between three and four billion dollars over the Hoover administration.

I was interested to hear the gentleman from New Jersey endorse the plan of redistribution of wealth. Coming from him, from the great East, and the Republican side of the House, it is refreshing.

The gentleman talked about unemployment and what a great problem it is; that it is not partisan; that it cannot be remedied by any one group, but he or his party offers us no solution, and he is a great industrialist. He has had to do with unemployment for many years. He and his company have been in a position, but neither has done anything about it. He prated of the President arraying class against class. Like his hero, Mr. Hoover, he is rather attempting to stir up those unfortunate people of ours who are still out of employment. Is this "playing politics with misery", as Mr. Hoover once said?

Of course, you remember Mr. Hoover's prediction that if he lost the election in 1932 "the grass would grow in the streets." Somebody said it might be growing there if it were not for the men we put to work. We did put them to work under C. W. A., W. P. A., and F. E. R. A., and they at least took the grass out of the streets which had grown there from 1929 to 1933. [Applause.]

I regret we did not put two cars in every garage, but we at least saved the garage, and we got at least one chicken in the pot for the farmer. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I cannot discuss garages.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman tell us the cost of it?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, when there are millions of our citizens out of work in this country, a prosperous country that is worth about $350,000,000,000, the expenditure of $5,000,000,000 or $10,000,000,000 or $20,000,000,000 to save our people is infinitesimal. [Applause.] This country has a better financial sheet today, I will wager, than any individual in this House or any business or corporation in the country. An indebtedness of only 10 percent of capital worth is so remarkably sound that it rarely exists. I was talking to some bankers recently about the ratio of a $30,000,000,000 debt to a capital worth of $350,000,000,000. I asked them if they considered this a sound basis for a loan. They said they never received an application as good, and they told me that the indebtedness always averaged at 50 percent of the capital worth, and many times more. Can the company of my distinguished friend from New Jersey show a balance sheet with a ratio of indebtedness to its capital worth of only 10 percent?

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this barrage is all we are going to be faced with—I really expected more; in fact, I could give the gentleman some ideas of things he might talk about [laughter]—we are willing to face the music. We Democrats are willing to go to the farmers, we are willing to go to the man in the street whom we tried to help, we are willing to go to those investors in stocks who were robbed of billions of dollars, who are at least assured it will never happen again because of the Securities Exchange Act, we are willing to go to those investors in utilities who were robbed overnight of $25,000,000,000 by the utility crowd; we are willing to go to them all and ask them whether or not they want to return to those old days of 1929 to 1933. We are confident of the answer.

This campaign is not going to be a negative campaign, except in the sense that the people will be asked: How would you like to go back? [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF].

Mr. SAUTHOFF. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of those representing agricultural districts to this resolution I introduced this morning:

Joint resolution requesting the President to terminate the concessions on dairy products contained in the Canadian, Netherlands, and Switzerland agreements, and requesting that no further concessions be granted to any country on dairy products

Whereas prior to his election the President of the United States made a definite pledge that there would be no reduction in the tariff rates on agricultural commodities; and

Whereas at the time the Reciprocal Trade Agreement Act was pending in Congress administration leaders made a similar pledge that the rates on major farm commodities would not be lowered under trade agreements; and

Whereas the dairy industry is the largest branch of American agriculture, representing from 20 to 25 percent of the national agricultural income; and

Whereas American dairy farmers are able and willing to supply the entire domestic needs of the United States for dairy products at reasonable prices; and

Whereas, notwithstanding the pledges heretofore mentioned, the State Department has concluded agreements with Canada and the Netherlands and Switzerland reducing the tariff on cream and on Cheddar, Edam, and Goudda cheese, Swiss and Gruyère cheese, the said reduction of cheese tariffs being unconditional and applicable to every nation of the world enjoying commercial relations with the United States; and

Whereas said concession will have the effect of opening up domestic markets to foreign producers at a time when under the Agricultural Adjustment Act vast quantities of dairy products are being purchased to sustain domestic price levels and when additional production of dairy products is anticipated because of the use of lands taken out of cultivation of other crops under Agricultural Adjustment programs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to impose upon imports of cream and Cheddar, Edam and Goudda, Swiss and Gruyère cheese quotas as provided for in the Agricultural Adjustment Act (sec. 22), which shall be fixed at 50 percent of the average annual quantity of such commodities which was imported into the United States during the period from July 1, 1928, to June 30, 1933, both dates inclusive, said quotas to apply to every country in the world; and be it further

Resolved, That in accordance with article VII of the treaties with Canada and the Netherlands, and article VI of the treaty with Switzerland, the President and the Secretary of State are requested to notify said countries of the imposition of said quotas and to advise said countries that the imposition of said quotas is deemed necessary by the Senate and House of Representatives as a means of protecting and safeguarding the American dairy farmer; and be it further

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested not to permit in any future agreement any reduction in the present dairy tariff structure of this country.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I think some of the remarks I shall make during the course of the time granted me are very appropriate in connection with the resolution just read by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF].

One of the chief problems before the country is the finding of markets for the products of our farms and factories. Since we have here at home the richest market in the world, one of the best ways to help agriculture and industry would be to preserve the home market for our own producers. The President, however, is tearing down the tariff through reciprocal-trade treaties and allowing a flood of competing agricultural and manufactured products to be imported from abroad.

I come from a section of the country where it is assumed that some people are somewhat inclined toward Yankee swapping. We used to swap jackknives as schoolboys "unsight, unseen", but we wanted a jackknife for a jackknife, whatever the quality of it might be. I never, as a Yankee swapper from the days of my boyhood at school, thought a swap giving the other fellow a 4-to-1 or 5-to-1 advantage was a good Yankee swap, but this is the type of swapping the President of the United States, under the advice of his distinguished Secretary of State and College Professor Sayre, is undertaking for this country. This swapping has brought about the expansion of imports coming into this country in the ratio of 4 and 5 to 1 as against exports going from this country to foreign countries.

In the 11 months ending November 30, 1935, our exports increased only $96,000,000 over the same period last year, while our imports increased $338,000,000. These are statistics taken from the January 10 report of the Department of Commerce, an official document which I have here before me. The loss for the domestic producer was in the ratio of nearly 4 to 1, and yet we were told that the trade-treaties program would result in a net benefit to him.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I cannot yield to the gentleman.

The publicity given out by the State Department as to the results of the reciprocal-trade treaties always refers to the increase of exports which has resulted, but it never offers comparisons of the excessive increase of importations. For example, the agreement with Cuba has been referred to as being beneficial to this country. Actually, it has been five times more beneficial to Cuba than to the United States. It became effective September 3, 1934, and in the 12-month period following, the increase in our imports from Cuba was $103,000,000, compared with increased exports to Cuba of only $21,000,000.

If this is the kind of swapping we are getting under your reciprocal-tariff agreements, I am Yankee enough to want to repudiate and repeal them.

The President has entered into 10 agreements so far under this so-called authority to make trade treaties. The countries with which agreements have been consummated are Cuba, Belgium, Haiti, Brazil, Sweden, Colombia, Canada, Honduras, the Netherlands, and Switzerland. Nobody has yet told me the difference between these so-called trade agreements and a foreign treaty requiring the approval of the Senate of the United States. Not one of these agreements has ever gone to the Senate. All but four of these treaties are now in operation. The Netherlands agreement becomes effective February 1, and the Swiss agreement on February 15. The Colombian and Honduran agreements must be ratified by the legislatures of these countries.

How awfully humiliating it is to us American citizens to think that some delegated official can enter into agreements in behalf of our Congress while we stand helpless and see them do so, realizing at the same time that the legislatures of the country affected must give their O. K. You on the Democratic side of the House may like it, but we on this side do not.

Reductions of duties in the case of one country are extended to all countries, with no reciprocal concessions required in return. It therefore amounts to a general tariff reduction, and that is what it is intended to be. The Democratic Party has not dared to come before the Congress of the United States and go through the formalities of reducing tariffs legitimately, legally, and constitutionally. They either know the tariff does not need revising or that the people would repudiate their reductions at the polls.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; I yield for a brief question.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand that the fact they lowered tariff rates on agricultural imports from Canada means that the same treatment is accorded to other countries?

Mr. TREADWAY. Other countries get the same benefit, but give up nothing in return. It is an act of generosity on the part of the President.

Mr. SNELL. To the detriment of the agriculture of the United States.

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; under the reciprocal feature of tariffs with the other countries.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TREADWAY. Having yielded to the gentleman from New York, I now yield to my neighbor and friend, born in the Berkshire Hills.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman point out the ratio between our total exports and total imports? I know the gentleman does not want to give a partial picture.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am not attempting to give those totals, as they are not relevant here. I am showing the effect of these swapping bargains that the gentleman's party inaugurated.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Is it not a fact that the exports——

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, my time is limited. I ask the gentleman to please let me proceed.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I just declined to yield to the gentleman from New York. I am sorry; I cannot yield further.

Germany is the only country, I may say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], that is excluded from these bargains; and the reason Germany is excluded, as I understand it, is that that country has imposed certain discriminations against American imports into Germany.

Under the Swedish agreement the President made reductions in 35 groups of commodities. Among the principal items that affected the section of the country I come from, New England, there was a reduction of 16⅔ percent in the duty on wrapping paper and a 50-percent reduction in the duty on processed paperboard. The importation of kraft paper in the first 4 months following the Swedish agreement amounted to 4,600 tons, whereas in the entire previous year, 1934, there were only 4,000 tons imported. That was 4,000 tons in the entire period of a year, as against 4,600 tons in 4 months. If the Democratic Party wants that kind of a swap, they may have it; but in the meantime the paper mills of New England are partially closed, and in some cases completely closed.

Let us take the Canadian agreement, to which the gentleman from Wisconsin referred. I have before me a list of reductions in the duties on the products of American farms, mines, forests, fisheries, and manufacturing establishments. Among the items on which reductions on duty of up to 50 percent were made are the following: Cattle, dairy cows, cream, cheese, poultry, maple sugar, breakfast foods, apples, strawberries, blueberries, cherries, peas, seed potatoes, turnips, hay, fish, lumber, pulpboard, harness and saddlery, and patent leather.

Here is a very interesting thing about the Canadian treaty. It establishes a quota for the importation of certain Canadian imports into this country at reduced rates. If this reciprocal-agreement idea is good for anything, why is it not good for the whole of the importations? Why limit it to certain quotas? I think perhaps the gentleman from Wisconsin would be interested in that. Of course, the fact is that although the quantity of goods to be imported at reduced rates is limited in certain instances, this limited quantity will establish the market price for the entire domestic production. That is what it will do to us.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Very briefly. I know the gentleman has a wonderful knowledge.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman does not kill me with kindness, and I do not need it. The gentleman knows that the quota is for the very purpose of meeting the argument that he himself is making.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman tell me why it is limited, if it is a good thing to have any additional imports at all? If it is a good thing to reciprocate, why not go the whole way? The gentleman's party does not dare to.

Mr. McCORMACK. The very purpose of that is to meet the gentleman's own argument.

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not yield further, as I am not arguing for increasing the quota, but repeat that a partial reciprocal arrangement shows that the proponents are afraid of their own bargain.

Mr. McCORMACK. What is New England's attitude on that matter?

Mr. TREADWAY. I do not yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, the gentleman does not dare to yield further.

Mr. TREADWAY. And the gentleman and his party does not dare tell the complete story. In addition to reducing the existing duties on many items, other articles have been bound on the free list by the Canadian treaty. That is a splendid arrangement! We have entered into that same arrangement in connection with some of these other reciprocal deals. We have agreed that there should not be any duty, for instance, on coffee. Has anyone suggested a duty on the coffee which comes in from Brazil? It is ridiculous. The same proposition appears in this Canadian deal. It is agreed that on some things there will not be a duty placed. There is none on them now and no expectation to put any on.

Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] a few moments ago spoke about going to the country in a few weeks upon certain issues. I prophesy that the Canadian reciprocal treaty, unconstitutional as I know it to be, will be one of the main issues in the approaching national election. Mark what I say! Mr. Chairman, why should we of this country import increased quantities of farm products from Canada or other countries when we already have an overproduction in our own country? Can anybody answer that question?

The Democratic Party has curtailed production; they have taken land out of use and paid people for not using farm land; still they invite the importation of farm products from Canada. "Consistency, thou art a jewel."

There is another example which I have before me. Even with existing tariffs, farm products have been coming in from abroad in increasing quantities, while farm exports have been decreasing. Here is a list of imports of agricultural products in the first 11 months of 1935, as compared with the same period in 1934:

Animals and animal products, edible, $44,779,000 in 1934; $68,146,000 in 1935. Included in this category are meat products, which increased from 57,000,000 pounds in 1934 to 105,000,000 pounds in 1935; also butter, which increased from 1,000,000 pounds in 1934 to 22,000,000 pounds in 1935.

Animals and animal products, inedible, $103,479,000 in 1934; $137,820,000 in 1935.

Vegetable food products and beverages, $425,375,000 in 1934; $529,128,000 in 1935. Included in this category are grains and preparations, which increased from $28,000,000 in 1934 to $68,000,000 in 1935.

Vegetable products, inedible, $206,792,000 in 1934; $255,574,000 in 1935.

In every instance there has been an increase in agricultural products brought into this country in competition with the farm products raised at home, while our agricultural exports have declined. There must be some explanation. If the Democratic Party wants to go to the farmers up in my territory on that basis, I hope they will be given a chance.

What did the candidate, Roosevelt, say in 1932 about farm products? He said, "I know of no effective excessively high duties on farm products." Still he allows agricultural duties to be reduced all along the line. He further stated: "I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered. To do so would be inconsistent with my entire farm program." His opinion seems to have changed very materially since he made that speech as a candidate before the farmers on October 26, 1932.

The President's pledge not to reduce agricultural tariffs must now be added to the long list of broken campaign promises. I think about the best illustration we have with reference to the demerits of the present farm program and the reciprocal-tariff agreements is the statement of a member of the Democratic Party and the President's recent foreign-trade adviser, Mr. George N. Peek. He has now gone the way of Lewis Douglas and other able men who could no longer stand the policies of the New Deal. He was correct when he said that the farmer is being made to "take the rap." Those are his identical words—the farmer is being made to "take the rap."

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. COFFEE], a member of the Democratic majority here, inserted in the RECORD on January 10 a letter from Mr. Peek to the farm leaders' meeting in Washington to evolve a substitute for the A. A. A., and among the recommendations Mr. Peek made was the following:

> The farmers should be given the full benefit of the domestic market. The importation of competitive agricultural products should be stopped. The attempt should be abandoned to effect a general reduction of the tariff through the medium of the so-called reciprocal-trade agreements program and the unconstitutional most-favored-nation policy.
> I do not feel that general tariff reduction is an appropriate policy at a time when 10,000,000 or more are out of work and when we are trying to restore domestic economic balance.

When the Canadian treaty was announced the administration tried to convince the farmers that the increased importation of Canadian agricultural products would be offset by increased exports of United States products to Canada. In this it was absolutely wrong, as usual. Our increased imports from Cuba in the first year under the operation of the Cuban treaty, amounting to $103,000,000, were only offset by $21,000,000 of increased exports to Cuba, as I have already shown. So far as the Canadians are concerned, they are not obligated to buy a single dollar's worth of United States farm products, and the chances are they will be smart enough not to. Moreover, our farmers should remember that they only get reduced rates from Canada while their own home market is thrown open to the entire world.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I must yield, with all deference, to the chairman of my committee.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The markets are thrown open, but are we obligated to buy? The gentleman says they are not obligated; are we obligated?

Mr. TREADWAY. If they will be able to buy——

Mr. DOUGHTON. Answer that question.

Mr. TREADWAY. We are Yankees enough to want to buy where we can buy the cheapest.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman says they are not obligated, and I now ask him if we are obligated to buy from them?

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman, who is known in North Carolina as "Farmer Bob"——

Mr. DOUGHTON. I want the gentleman to be fair and answer that question.

Mr. TREADWAY. As a good farmer in North Carolina, I am sure he will buy where he can buy the cheapest. He is too good a Yankee to do otherwise.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman said they were not obligated, and I now ask him to be fair and state whether or not we are obligated to buy their goods?

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman's own Yankee sense teaches him to buy where he can buy the cheapest.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman does not answer because he knows we are not obligated to buy, and yet he tries to leave a different impression. [Applause.]

Mr. TREADWAY. Of course, it is not a question of what we are obligated to buy, but what the foreigner will be able to ship into our market to the detriment of our own producers. But, to answer the gentleman, I will say that we are buying from abroad now in great quantities and will buy even more under reduced tariffs. That is what the Democratic Party wants us to do—buy foreign, not American.

Here is a point that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] brought out. Farmers should remember they only get reduced rates from Canada, while our market is thrown open to the world. This is the serious rub. There is a very excellent illustration of this with respect to Cuba. We are today losing five times more than we gain under the Cuban agreement—five times extra; and it must be remembered that the Cuban reductions are not generalized in favor of other countries as are those made in the other nine treaties thus far entered into.

Under the agreement recently concluded with the Netherlands the farmers were again made to "take the rap." Items on which the duty was decreased included: Potato starch, wrapper tobacco, cheese, pearl barley, flower bulbs, garden and field seeds, split peas, cabbage, sauerkraut, cacao butter, bristol board, and strawboard and straw paper.

Now, there are certain items here of much interest to my section of the country; for instance, wrapper tobacco; a reduction of from 26½ percent to 34 percent on the particular kind of tobacco grown in the Connecticut Valley.

This is a tremendous reduction, and I am confident that the farmers of the Connecticut Valley will resent being forced to limit their production and then have the administration encourage increased foreign importations. The reduction in duty is bound to drive down the domestic price and force United States growers to give up home production. The importations will come chiefly from Sumatra, one of the Dutch East Indies, where tobacco is produced by forced labor. We had that question up here 2 or 3 years ago. The Connecticut farmer pays an honest day's wage to his employees on the farm, and yet he must compete with this foreign tobacco produced by convict and indentured labor.

There is a 50-percent reduction in the duty on strawboard, which is made at a time when foreign offerings are already being made at less than the American cost of production. The 33⅓-percent reduction in the duty on bristolboard also affects New England industry. The imports are used chiefly in making lamp shades. We can make just as good products here.

The Netherlands agreement offers an interesting situation. They agree to buy American wheat and flour equal to 5 percent of the consumptive demand. Now, see the joker there which is included in this proviso:

Provided, That the price of the milling wheat originating in the United States of America is competitive with the world price for milling wheat of comparable grade and quality.

This absolutely lets them out unless we meet the world price.

The agreement with Switzerland also offers a very interesting set of comparisons. The reductions are practically all on industrial items. The principal exception is a 30-percent reduction in the duty on Swiss cheese. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SAUTHOFF] has already referred to the item of Swiss cheese. This is a reduction against agriculture, but most of the Swiss reductions are on industries. Among the industrial items on which reductions in duty were made are the following: Coal-tar dyes, watch movements and parts, fine-count cotton cloths, silk cloth, knit underwear, straw hats, machine-embroidered fabrics and articles, certain kinds of machines, and turned shoes.

We all know what a hard struggle the watch industry in this country has had over a period of years. Out of the 40 or 50 factories formerly operating only 3 are in business today.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. REED] has handed me a communication from one of these three remaining watchmakers, who happens to be a constituent of his. Here is what he has to say in regard to the reduction in the duty on watches:

The reductions in the treaty are drastic, and we cannot at this time predict the result. It is safe to say, however, that we will not dare to further increase employment nor wages with these new handicaps staring us in the face.

I prefer evidence like that, Mr. Chairman, to that provided by college professors dealing through the State Department headed by a "free trader."

If the Swiss Government—

He continues—

will really try to stop smuggling it will to some extent offset the increased legal importations of their watches.

If they will. "If" is a small word, but there is a lot back of it. We have tried to legislate here for the protection of our people against smuggling. There is a bill awaiting action in the Senate now that might do some good, but there is not a more intricate schedule in the entire tariff list than that of protection against watches and clocks. It is very intricate. The Ways and Means Committee with its experts spent—I was going to say "weeks"—in trying to set up a fair schedule; and still, in a brief period of a few hours, when they send social lights over here from Switzerland, they are entertained here by our people and made a great deal of; and the Secretary of State and his cohorts sit around a table behind locked doors and tell the watch people of this country what rates of duty they can get agreeable to the people from Switzerland.

Certainly the agreement will strike a deathblow to the watch industry of this country, of which there is a factory in my State, now represented by a gentleman who I imagine would vote for the reciprocal tariff if he had a chance—the gentleman from Cambridge [Mr. RUSSELL].

This watch industry is important to the national defense, as it manufactures timing instruments used in war, and, unfortunately, they are needed then. Nevertheless, the law sacrifices this industry while foreigners send in their product, provided they say they will not smuggle any in if they can help it. That is a great notion.

What about the reduction in the duty on certain cotton cloth, affecting the textile industry in my section? While in Japan recently I visited a cotton mill, and at a later date I hope to make reference to that. Think of it! Where they pay a wage of a yen or a yen and a half, about 40 cents a day, our wages in this country are 30 times as much. Moreover, their workmen work 17 hours a day.

In the first 11 months of 1935 we imported 59,000,000 square yards of cotton cloth, as against 37,000,000 square yards in the same period the year before. The distinguished Secretary of State has recently been in consultation with Japanese representatives who are offering to reduce their cotton exports to our market to moderate levels. That is a pretty indefinite statement, "moderate levels." I have seen some indications of the capacity of the Japanese in the last few weeks, and I am wondering what they consider moderate levels. They are only interested in their capacity to get into our markets and nothing else.

The policy of the administration in regard to imports was set forth by Secretary Hull in a letter to Chairman DOUGHTON last April.

Secretary Hull said:

In my opinion, it is not only unwise as a general policy to yield to the demand for greater restrictions upon imports, but would be particularly unfortunate at this time, since such action could not but weaken the leadership of the administration in the efforts that it is making to reduce the many restrictions hampering the flow of international trade.

Under the reciprocal tariff act, tariff making has been taken out of the hands of Congress, where it constitutionally belongs. I do not think that fact can be impressed too strongly on the minds of the American people.

Under the Constitution we have the right to originate tariff rates, but under the New Deal we have that power no longer.

We have a useless Tariff Commission that was intended to give information to Congress on how to adjust tariff rates, but now there is a secret trade agreements committee which fixes the rates.

The tariff is the only bulwark between our standard of living and that of the rest of the world. When we make these swapping bargains with foreign countries, we are making very serious trades, my friends. What we are actually doing is bargaining away the livelihood of our citizens. I repeat, as I have said on this floor previously, that no one man or small group of men should be given such a power as we under these reciprocal treaties—and that is what they are; not trade agreements—give to the President of the United States. A secret group from the State Department sits behind closed doors to agree with representatives of foreign countries what our people shall be permitted to produce at home and what they shall be compelled to buy abroad. Final approval is given by the President; and, naturally, no one head—as brilliant as our President is—can understand all those details that are involved. The Congress, in neither branch, has any power or opportunity to approve or reject these agreements when entered into; but many of them cannot be entered into by a foreign country unless their body corresponding to this agrees to it.

The trade-agreements program has been forced upon Congress and the American people. The former policy of protecting the American market for Americans can only be restored by the election of a Republican President and a Republican Congress in November. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS].

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, seated in the gallery or on the floor of the House listening to these discussions the average person would have a suspicion that probably we are approaching a general election. In that fact lies a very great danger which Members of Congress on each side of the aisle must hold in constant understanding and appreciation. We do not expect the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth from either side. The Democrats are going to claim more than they are entitled to, and the Republicans are not going to give them credit for what they ought to have. But in this campaign and in shaping the governmental policies of this country during this session we must not forget that we are still in a very critical situation in America. The statement is true I believe that when this administration came to responsibility it inherited a deficit which had been accumulated within the 3 or 4 years preceding the beginning of the administration of several billion dollars. I think it will be conceded also, and we must understand, the condition that obtained in the country at the time this administration came to responsibility. I quite understand the arguments that you are going to make, that conditions would naturally improve, and so forth, and that is a legitimate argument if you can get by with it; but in any event we well remember, those of us who were here and have been here, the crisis, the apprehension, and the humility with which the great interests came here begging for salvation.

Our deficit now stands above $30,000,000,000. I would not be candid if I should state that I have agreed with this administration in all of the details of what is known as the New Deal. I have agreed with the administration, and do agree with the administration, in what I believe to be the two fundamental things the President himself adheres to. I believe the President has a deep sympathy for the average man, and notwithstanding what we may say here, I think this is the first time a President has appreciated the natural position which agriculture holds in the economic structures. Let us see what is our situation. We lack $30,000,000,000 of having a cent in the Treasury, and we are showing no substantial disposition to balance the Budget. There has been created throughout America, and it exists throughout America, a feeling that the short cut to the settlement of all public and private economic difficulties is to come to the Federal Treasury and get the money. That is a bad situation, and it is going to bring all sorts of problems to us. This administration has done one or two definite things. I think it will be agreed that it prevented a crash at a big price, and insofar as we are all concerned as a community, we are in the same boat, and the money that we have borrowed we have borrowed from ourselves as a community. That is a fortunate situation, but it is one that calls for a very high degree of statesmanship in working ourselves out of the difficulty. Many billions of dollars it has cost and a crash has been avoided, and circulation, though we must admit it has been stimulated largely by artificial means, has at last been obtained in the economic body, and we do not owe anybody anything. We owe it to ourselves, and the people who have loaned that money to the Government probably would not have had any money to loan to anybody if the things had not been done which have been done.

We are going to run into another very interesting thing, and that is that the people who were broke 3 or 4 years ago and who do not consider themselves broke now are not willing to pay the price of their salvation. They do not want to pay for the change in their economic condition, and we are going to run into that on both sides. It does not make any difference who comes into power next time; that is one of the problems that we will have to confront.

I want to call your attention, regardless of whether you come from a city or the country, are a Democrat or Republican, to one thing that has to be done before we leave here. I believe it to be a historically established fact, beyond any question of doubt, that the beginning of the paralysis of the economic body—and that is what has been the matter with us—began with the paralysis of the buying power of the agricultural interests. The facts leave no question about that. My distinguished friend from Michigan the other day made the statement that the automobile industry had lifted Michigan out of its depressed condition. The truth of it, of course, is if there had not been farmers and those directly dependent upon farmers scattered all over the country to buy the automobiles from the manufacturers in Michigan, the manufacturers in Michigan could not have done anything on earth about the situation.

We are in this very great difficulty in dealing with the agricultural situation. I am speaking to you not as Republicans or Democrats. When we passed the protective tariff act and it was held constitutional by the United States Supreme Court, then when we went further and cast off all disguise of trying to raise money by the tariff act and gave to the President of the United States the power to raise the tariff when prices and profits of tariff beneficiaries were too low, and it was held by the Supreme Court that the power is inherent in the Federal Congress to give to the President that power, a very far-reaching thing was done. When prices are not compensatory the President of the United States can raise the prices which Americans pay for the products of tariff-protected industries. Now, let us look at that a minute. That is a clear-cut holding by the Supreme Court, that the Congress has the power to deal directly with prices and profits, not revenue, or to delegate that power to the President; but prices and profits of a particular group of our people, not as such, of course, but people engaged in particular sorts of industry which happen to be tariff protected. Regardless of what you think about the protective tariff, the result of the application of that tariff tends to put out of natural balance the economic equilibrium as between and among the industries of this country, especially as between industry and surplus-producing farmers. We did not feel that so much when we had so much new territory and the railroads carried large numbers of people quickly into virgin agricultural territory, and carried with them these fine agricultural implements with which they proceeded to rob the soil of its productivity. This did not mean so much to us when we were a debtor nation and we could pay our interest account to foreign countries with the surplus of our agricultural production; but when the war was over and we came back with much of the world's gold, and we came back a great creditor nation instead of a debtor nation, we lost, as a result of that, a great part of our foreign market; at least, it was made more difficult to hold it. That produced a new condition which challenges the genius of the statesmen of this particular period in which you and I live.

We used to talk about the problems of the farmer as something that was of interest to the farmer, and the appeal on behalf of the farmer was to do justice to the farmer, but under pressure of inventions and discoveries, the details of which I will not have time to go into, you all know the picture, anyway, to a degree that never obtained before in the world, every industry is part of every other industry, and in a peculiar sense, agriculture is the root of the tree. I do not believe that any statesman, any political philosopher, would offer any theory under which he could hope for prosperity in America, that did not carry with it prosperity to the 30,000,000 people who live right down next to the soil. They are, in a peculiar sense, the root of the tree.

Now, so much for that. What does this decision of the Supreme Court do? I am not going to criticize the Court. I do not want to get into that field at all; but what is the situation in which we appear to be left? We appear to be left in a situation where a part of the industries of this country may have their prices arbitrarily raised by the might of Congress and the President in order to give them better prices and better profits; and, on the other hand, this great unorganized body of American citizens who farm, apparently, insofar as we have been able yet to devise, are left outside of the exercise of that power. That is not something which is far away in its importance to those of us who live in the cities. When you come to examine the economic organization, made up of all our industries, you will discover it it very similar to the organization of the human body. I mean modern economic organization. Just as certainly as you cannot take any more blood out of that hand through the venous system than the arteries put in, these farmers cannot buy any more automobiles and other things from us than we give them the money to buy with in exchange for their commodities. We learned that as an actual fact.

That is one thing for which I can hardly excuse the captains of industry and the supposed-to-be wise men of this country. Actually they saw the farmers get 13 cents a bushel for corn, 5½ cents a pound for cotton, 8 cents a bushel for oats in my country, and everything else in proportion, and they thought it was fine. But the result of it was that while we were moving their commodities to us we did not give them enough in exchange to move our commodities back to them. If the farmer could not buy, the man in the village could not buy. If the man in the village could not buy, the people in the city of Dallas, where I live, could not buy; and finally it went on until the manufacturers, who produced automobiles in the great cities of my friend, could not sell. Yet those people actually felt, apparently, that it was a fine situation.

I make this statement, measuring my words—and I say this in no unkind spirit—the producers of exportable agricultural surpluses are being deliberately bled by this Government through the protective tariff and that blood pumped into industries. That is the purpose of the tariff. A protective tariff is for the purpose of dealing with prices and profits; giving some people more prices and more profits than they would otherwise get. On down the line this boost in price is passed until these unorganized producers are reached. They cannot pass it on. They sell to the highest bidder in competition with the cheapest producers in the world. I speak as a city man. In my judgment we have in that situation the greatest threat to industry, to recovery, to stability. If we permit the buying power of these 30,000,000 to become paralyzed again, that paralysis, as certainly as night follows the day, will creep on up through the village of Garland, where I once lived, to Dallas, where I now live, into St. Louis, into Chicago, and into New York, and we will have spent in vain these billions of dollars, and will be right back where we started 3 years ago. [Applause.]

I have 2 minutes left. I wish I had more time. Let me renew what I said in the beginning, Mr. Chairman. When I heard these gentlemen making political speeches I said to myself, "Boys will be boys." We have a campaign on and we know it. Each side is going to win if it can, and we know it. But I want to say this to the compliment of the Congress: I have been here a long time, I have seen partisan spirit manifested here, but I have yet to see a time of real crisis in the country's history when the men and women on the Democratic side and the men and women on the Republican side were not able to be statesmen, were not able to forget they were Democrats, to forget they were Republicans, and come to the service of their common country. [Applause.] This next campaign, we must not forget, will be fought out in an atmosphere of the great economic danger and of the gravest sort of dangers to this country of ours. This session of Congress will be conducted in that atmosphere. My time has expired.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to take only a few minutes to call attention of the Members of the House, as well as the people of the country, to the fact that in this appropriation bill is carried the first appropriation made for the Comptroller General of the United States and the General Accounting Office in the past 16 years that will not be administered by Comptroller General J. R. McCarl.

Mr. McCarl was appointed to his present office by President Harding. Under the law his term of office is 15 years, and he cannot be reappointed unless existing law should be amended to permit such action. His term expires June 30, 1936.

I became acquainted with Mr. McCarl long before he was appointed to this position, and while it is true that he is a Republican, was named by a Republican President and confirmed by a Republican Senate, yet I, as a Democrat, am glad to testify that, in my judgment, his administration has been absolutely fair and just to all. Further than that, he proved that he was the proper man for the position. His job is to say "no", and in saying "no" he has been cursed and criticized, in my opinion, more than any official who ever served the Government. This criticism has come from Presidents, Cabinet officers, bureau officials, and Government employees. Why? Because he had the courage to perform the duties of his office as the Congress in enacting the law said he should perform them.

It was not a personal matter with Mr. McCarl. The Congress provided that he should see that money appropriated should only be spent as the various laws provided. When officials and employees of the executive and judicial branches of the Government attempted to spend money from specific appropriations other than we said it should be spent, it was the Comptroller General and the General Accounting Office that saw that the mandate of the Congress was carried out. His office has considered hundreds of millions of dollars, if not billions, in claims. It is impossible to estimate the amount that decisions of this Office has saved to the taxpayers of the country.

As chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments I have always received from Mr. McCarl and his able associates valuable assistance and fine cooperation, and I know requested reports furnished on pending legislation and reports to committees of the Congress on various matters have been exceedingly helpful in every particular. I feel sure that a vast majority of the Members of this great legislative body join me in extending to General McCarl our generous thanks for his fine cooperation and assistance during his tenure in office and our sincere good wishes for his future good health and happiness. [Applause.]

In this connection I deem it meet and proper to say that I believe the Congress should be greatly interested in who is to be the next Comptroller General who will head the General Accounting Office—the organization that is the right arm of the legislative body. It should be remembered that the Congress can lay taxes and appropriate money for what it believes will best serve the public interest, but it must rely, to a large extent at least, upon the General Accounting Office to see that the appropriation laws are properly carried out. As I said, the present Comptroller General has for the past 15 years rendered highly efficient service, even though potent opposition has had to be met.

I repeat that the selection of the next Comptroller General is, and should be, of vital interest to the Congress of the United States, and my hope is that only a man of great ability and strict integrity will be selected by President Roosevelt to fill what I consider one of the most important offices in the Federal Government. [Applause.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the remarks of our distinguished and beloved chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. SUMNERS of Texas] and I was very much impressed with his opening statement that the attack of the Republicans on the Democratic Party and its policies of the last 34 months will be more severe than the evidence and the record justifiably warrants, and that the claims of the Democrats will constitute to some extent an exaggeration of the benefits the administration has brought to the country since it went into power. I think, as practical men, we can all agree with this statement; and I think, as practical men, we can all see that these two conditions might occur—underestimation and exaggeration—and still have a remote connection with the truth.

It is in connection with an article appearing in this morning's papers that I have asked for time to refer to an unfair and vicious implication from Mr. Fletcher, the chairman of the Republican National Committee, which I think is so far removed from the truth that it does not reflect a true state of mind of the fair-minded members of the Republican Party of either the House or the Senate. I like a good fighting man or woman Member of the House. [Laughter.] I see the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. KAHN] here. I like a Republican who fights for what he thinks is right, and for his party. Naturally, we have a mutual respect for one another, realizing that both great parties are striving for the control of government and that between the parties and the control of government are the voters. Such fair policies as might attract support, and such fair procedure as might be consistent with obtaining control of government, are followed by practical members of all parties.

In taking this course, however, with all of the colorings that are employed, which are justifiably employed, there is a limit beyond which anyone should not go. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman of the Republican National Committee went beyond that limit in a disclosure of communications between himself and the National Broadcasting Co. and the Columbia Broadcasting Co. in relation to the securing of time with reference to a "political skit" it was contemplated to put on over the air. I am not going into the controversy as to whether time for this "political skit" should have been granted by these two great broadcasting agencies. I shall not comment on the discussion as to whether or not time for political speeches should be given before next June where compensation is charged. Time is now given gratuitously, so I understand. I am not concerned with these questions because they are matters between Mr. Fletcher and these two broadcasting chains. But when Mr. Fletcher and others undertake to charge that the administration is in some way connected with such actions, then I think Mr. Fletcher goes far beyond what is honest, what is fair, what is proper, even under the harsh and practical rules of politics. If we Democrats were to make this charge against a Republican administration in power, I would take the same position, in the absence of evidence supporting such a charge.

I like a good fighter. I admire my friend TREADWAY when he gets down here in the Well and makes a fighting speech. I like my friend EATON when he gets down here and makes a fighting speech. I like to see a fair and hard blow given, and I like to see men take fair and hard blows themselves. I do not like to see charges made that are entirely unjustified, such as the charge made by Mr. Fletcher, the chairman of the Republican National Committee. He does not make the charge directly, but in a subtle manner he conveys it. I am confining my remarks to Mr. Fletcher and to Mr. Spangler, director of the western division of the Republican National Committee, who joined with him.

What does Mr. Fletcher say? He had a controversy, and he had a perfect right to express his opinion with reference to whether or not these broadcasting stations were right or wrong. I have no controversy with him on the matter of whether or not he thought this "political skit" should be put on. He has a perfect right to take a position on that matter. I might have my own individual opinion as to the advisability, because of general opinion existing, with reference to those in the public service of putting on such a skit. I believe that everyone under whom I have served has been honest and zealous in his efforts in the public service, and lack of confidence on the part of the public has been brought about by this type of campaigning that is sometimes engaged in, together with ridiculous charges that are made and which are in no way connected with the elements of truth. But when he undertakes to imply that the action on the part of the National Broadcasting Co. and the Columbia Broadcasting Co. is connected with the present administration, then I say he should produce the evidence. I challenge him to produce that evidence. In the absence of the production of the evidence, the gentleman stands before the American public as a prevaricator.

Mr. BOLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BOLTON. In view of what the gentleman has said with reference to these charges, would the gentleman object to having the full correspondence in this matter added to his remarks?

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not think the gentleman is justified in asking me to have that kind of correspondence added to my remarks. The gentleman can take his own time and offer that correspondence.

Mr. BOLTON. I think it would be illuminating.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the gentleman mean to say on his honor as a Member of the House and as a gentleman, without regard to the minor issues involved, that he has any evidence to support the fact that the administration influenced the action of these two broadcasting companies?

Mr. BOLTON. I am merely suggesting that the correspondence with reference to this matter might be inserted, and then we could judge for ourselves.

Mr. McCORMACK. If the gentleman wants to do that on his own time, he is perfectly at liberty to do so.

Mr. BOLTON. My suggestion is that this might be the proper place to insert the correspondence.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman may get time from the Republican side in which to insert it. I want to yield all I can, but the gentleman himself knows that if I were to ask him to put in correspondence as a part of his remarks when he had the floor the gentleman might well take a position in opposition without being placed in the position of being afraid to.

Mr. BOLTON. I thought it might be proper to put it in here.

Mr. McCORMACK. I submit the matter to my friend's honest judgment.

Mr. Chairman, what I say is purely impersonal. A number of implications are made. Here is one of them:

> Whether or not they are doing this of their own free will or this position is taken by them through fear of the administration in Washington has not been disclosed.

So said Mr. Spangler.

Mr. Fletcher in his letter to the broadcasting companies stated:

> I cannot, however, free myself of the impression that the attitude you have taken is affected and perhaps involuntarily controlled by the political party in power, which regulates the issuance of your licenses.

He also makes other unfair implications and his letter clearly shows that he has absolutely no evidence in support of the same. These implications are not fair. It is conveying subtly, insidiously, unjustly, and dishonestly to the American public an impression that does not justifiably exist.

They admit they have not the evidence, and yet they subtly present the impression to the American people that because of some controversy between these two stations and the chairman of the Republican National Committee, coupled with the refusal of the two broadcasting stations to take favorable action, there must be some influence on the part of the present administration.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan for a serious question.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Agreeing with all the gentleman has said, and assuming that Mr. Fletcher has no basis for the charge, will the gentleman answer me seriously this question: Does he think that the President was fair the other night when he charged his critics with being greedy and ambitious and further charged them with having improper motives?

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, I am not agreeing he made those specific charges.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That inference could be drawn from the President's remarks.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman's question is not relevant to my remarks, but I will answer the question. The gentleman, I know, will disagree with me, and I respect his right of disagreement. I am absolutely in accord with the sentiments expressed by President Roosevelt on that occasion.

Mr. HOFFMAN. And those inferences?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am absolutely in accord with the President's views. I may say that he confined his statement to the group that have injected business into politics, and that small group of utility magnates, not the 90 percent, who sent the message to the American people that the utilities should "gang up" against the administration, and that is the phrase the President properly used. He simply used their own language and accepted, for the people, their challenge.

Business should mind its own affairs, so far as directly entering into politics is concerned. A certain percentage of businessmen have gone into politics and the very element that have gone into politics is the element that have created the abuses which called for consideration somewhere. The abuses that they caused called for regulation and control. They refused to or could not control the situation themselves. The continuance of these abuses would have been and is harmful to the American people. It necessarily follows that we must turn to the only agency we have, the Government of the American people, to regulate and control those abuses, for the general welfare of all our people.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman answer this further question: If that is what the President meant when he was talking to us, why was it necessary for him at the Jackson Day dinner to qualify his statement?

Mr. McCORMACK. That was no qualification.

Much has been said about the President appearing here. Without regard to his motive—and I do not agree with his partisan critics—may I say that we are all in the political field. I have heard a few of my distinguished friends on the Republican side take the floor and talk about politics. There is not a thing that we do that is not connected with politics. If we get a job for some poor unfortunate man in our district, we cannot divorce that fact from politics; yet our motive may not have anything to do with politics. That is the field we are in. If we do something for a friend, politics is charged; and yet if someone else does something for a friend it is called friendship. We are practical men and women, but everything we do has a connection with politics. Irrespective of what our motive might be, that is the result.

One result of the President's appearance here will be good for all time in the future. To have a President of the United States, whoever he may be in the future, appear before the Congress at a time when as many of his people as possible can have the opportunity of hearing him will be good for the country. This will bring the Government closer to the people. Regardless of what the motive may be, this will be the result.

Why do you suppose our Supreme Court appointed a press agent; and who would dare criticize that? I would not. I applaud it and I approve it. The purpose is to bring the Supreme Court and the people closer together.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts 3 additional minutes.

Mr. McCORMACK. If that is not the purpose—and I do not say it is—it is the result. It has a tendency to bring government closer to the people, and I approve what the Supreme Court has done; and brushing aside politics and looking at basic results, the appearance of the President here at a time when the maximum number of American people could listen to him is a good precedent to establish, and one that I hope all future Presidents will follow, because it brings government and the people closer to each other. [Applause.]

It is easy to criticize, and some of my friends have asked the question: What about the cost? Well, all I can liken it to is the expense of maintaining a family. When we talk in billions it looks big, and it is big, but when we get down to a family, then we begin to understand these questions better, and the American people will understand them better. Take one of our own families. We are getting along, income is coming in, with normal times, and our outlay is dependent upon our income. Everybody is happy and the members of the family are well, and then sickness happens, and when sickness happens in a family that is when expenses start. That is when we have to incur emergency expenses, and when sickness visits a nation that is when we have emergency expenses confronting the nation. When we have a sick relative we call in a doctor, and the doctor is honest and sincere. He has made a diagnosis and is prescribing treatment, but our loved one does not respond, and is sinking, and sinking, and fear enters our mind, and what do we do? We inevitably obtain the services of another doctor, and if our loved one comes back and is on the road to recovery we have confidence in that doctor. This is what has happened. On March 4, 1933, the American people were like a sick patient. They repudiated the doctor they had had from 1929 to 1933, and by the election of 1932 they employed another doctor. This doctor went in, and whether or not you like his treatment—and I do—he has brought about favorable results to the Nation.

In the coming election the people of the United States—the patient—are not going to forget President Roosevelt, the great doctor who brought the patient back to health. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield one-half minute to my colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOLTON].

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, in view of the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and insert the correspondence between the chairman of the Republican National Committee and the broadcasting companies, and let the RECORD indicate what is correct in the matter. I am not personally familiar with what has transpired, but I think the correspondence fully shows what is the true situation.

I have noted with interest the reported statement of the gentleman's colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] as to the desirability of an investigation of the Federal Communications Commission with regard to reported irregularities in that body. I feel that such an investigation is highly desirable; in fact, I should like to see the purpose of the investigation broadened in order that the true situation may be fully disclosed as to the activities of the radio companies and the question which has been raised as to what is the connection, if any, between the large radio companies or chains and the Commission. Also, what influence has the present administration in this field which may be properly termed a public utility in the interest of the general public.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DECEMBER 13, 1935.

Mr. EDWARD KLAUBER,
Executive Vice President,
Columbia Broadcasting System, New York City.

MY DEAR MR. KLAUBER: The Republican National Committee is preparing its plans for radio broadcasting. These plans contemplate the purchase of the following radio time over the Columbia networks and owned and managed stations:

One-half hour weekly Columbia network, with selected supplementary groups and certain individual stations where it is possible to obtain stations without taking entire groups.

One-half hour Columbia basic network, with possibly certain selected stations on the Columbia basis supplementary group.

Weather reports, time signals, 1-minute announcements, 5-minute programs, 15-minute, and half-hour programs where such service or facilities are available for commercial sponsorship on stations owned or operated by the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Starting date: Sometime prior to June 1, 1936. Possibly January.

Programs: The programs to be used will be such vehicles as the Republican National Committee may in its opinion deem to be proper for carrying the Republican message to the people.

As I have a meeting in Washington Monday morning on the question of plans and budgets, it will be appreciated if you will advise by return special-delivery letter, so I may advise the Honorable Henry P. Fletcher, chairman of the Republican National Committee, as to the acceptance by your company of this business, when, as, and if, offered on the above basis.

Thanking you in advance for a prompt reply, I am,

Cordially,

THOMAS G. SABIN.

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC.,
485 Madison Avenue, New York, December 27, 1935.

Mr. THOMAS G. SABIN,
Director Radio Division Republican National Committee,
New York City.

MY DEAR MR. SABIN: Replying to your letters of December 13 and December 26, this is to advise you that it is our policy not to sell time for political broadcasting until after the regular party conventions next summer. We are leaving to the judgment of the managers of those few stations we own the question of whether or not they will sell time for political broadcasting before the conventions to local and State committees.

We will not allow dramatization of political issues if time is bought after the conventions.

Our reasons for not selling time at present are as follows: We feel it to be our duty as a public service to devote a proper amount of time to the discussion of political issues without charge. When the campaigns actually are on so much time is needed for this purpose in more or less regular series that we are then compelled to charge for it, but we do not wish to charge until we have to.

The sale of such time over an indefinite period in such quantities as parties have been about to buy would destroy or threaten the destruction of our program balance, and this we do not believe to be in the best interests of the public or of good broadcasting.

Our reasons for not allowing dramatizations are as follows: Appeals to the electorate should be intellectual and not based on emotion, passion, or prejudice. We recognize that even the oratorical discussion of campaign issues can be to a degree stamped with the aforementioned flaws, but we are convinced that dramatizations would throw the radio campaign almost wholly over to the emotional side. Then, too, we believe that the dramatic method by its very nature would tend to overemphasize incidents of minor importance and significance simply because of the dramatic value. While we realize that no approach to the electorate is absolutely ideal, we believe American voters have long been trained to discriminate among the assertions of orators, whereas we do not believe they could discriminate fairly among dramatizations, so that the turn of national issues might well depend on the skill of warring dramatists rather than the merits of the issue debated.

Very truly yours,

EDWARD KLAUBER.

[Copy of telegram from Chairman Fletcher to the president, Columbia Broadcasting System, New York, N. Y.]

JANUARY 1, 1936.

The press announces that arrangements have been made, or are being made, by your company to broadcast over a Nation-wide hook-up the speech to be delivered by the President to the Congress on Friday night. If this be true, as chairman of the Republican National Committee, I respectfully request that your company allot on some closely following day the same amount of time over the same stations at the same hour of the day given to Mr. Roosevelt for a broadcast of comment on the issues confronting the next session of Congress by Republican spokesmen, to be selected by me, after consultation with the Republican leaders of both Houses of Congress.

The essence of American democracy and free speech is fairness. If you grant my request, it will demonstrate that you are in no way influenced by fear of the party in power.

The President is a candidate for reelection this year. The House of Representatives and the United States Senate have only once before set aside their rules to have a special night session for a Presidential address. That was the memorable occasion in April 1917 when war was declared.

So far as the American press is concerned, it would print the text of the President's message, irrespective of the hour of the joint session, and the Members of Congress would quite as readily attend a day session in the regular course.

The President's decision to dramatize his message and to bring down to the level of a political speech his constitutional right and duty to address the Congress on the state of the Union is understandable in the light of past performances.

It is apparent, therefore, that the President considers the Members of the Senate and the House as only incidentally his audience, and that he will be addressing himself to the electorate as a part of his campaign for reelection. Of course, he has a perfect right to do so if the Congress sets aside the time it wishes to receive his message.

We are not objecting to the program outlined but merely requesting an equal opportunity to place our case before the people with the same facilities, the same stations, and, potentially, the same audience.

The political character of the speeches by members of the administration over the radio should be recognized for what they are. Both sides of the vital current issues should be presented to the American jury for their own judgment. Unless the party in opposition be granted equal facilities, the dominant party can control the instrumentalities of communication in an effort to perpetuate itself in power.

I would appreciate a prompt response so that I may arrange for speakers to present the Republican point of view.

HENRY P. FLETCHER,
Chairman, Republican National Committee.

[Copy of telegram from William S. Paley, president, Columbia Broadcasting System, to Chairman Fletcher]

JANUARY 2, 1936.

This is in reply to your telegram of January 1 requesting that we allot to Republican spokesmen, to be chosen by you on some closely following day, the same amount of time over the same station at the same hour of the day given to the President for his address tomorrow night to the Congress and to the American people. We have considered with great care the reasons set forth by you for believing this action should be taken by us. We do not question your right to ascribe to the President political motives for his decision to address the people of America at the same time that he addresses their Congress. On the other hand, we do not believe that you should ask us to base our allotments of time on such interpretation by you or by others. The Columbia Broadcasting System will continue to distinguish between the office of President and the Government, on the one hand, and the political parties and their candidate on the other, without regard to whether a candidate is in office or not. Throughout this company's existence Columbia has always acceded to requests for time to be used by the President in addressing the people of the United States.

With regard to the specifications of your request for time, I must inform you that I do not believe it is either possible or wise for broadcasting to adopt a mathematical formula of fairness. This is true, first, because broadcasting has many duties and responsibilities besides serving as a medium for the dissemination of political discussion, and second, because public interest in varying issues, as nearly as we can judge it; the speakers, the probability of their effecting the action which they advocate, and many other factors enter into the decision as to how much time to allot to whom.

For us to adopt anything like a mathematical formula would be wholly to disregard other demands of balanced programming and to surrender into the keeping of others the exercise of that editorial judgment and responsibility which we believe devolves upon us and which we gladly accept and seek to discharge. We believe that a demand similar to that made upon us would be almost unanimously rejected by the newspaper editors of this country who would not commit the allotment of either position or space in their newspapers into the hands of others, but who on the contrary have, rightly I believe, always reserved to themselves judgment as to relative position and space to be allotted to political addresses and all other news events.

We are not under the domination of this administration and we have never been under the domination of any other. I am therefore forced to challenge the statement in your telegram to me that for us to accede to your request would be proof that we are not under such domination. We do not need such proof. Our record is proof enough. Throughout our history we have allotted freely time on the air for political discussion and we shall continue to do so. Within the past few weeks we have presented among other speakers in opposition Senator Borah, former President Hoover, Representative Hamilton Fish, the Honorable Henry P. Fletcher, and we have scheduled to speak in the near future, in a number of instances at our own invitation, former President Hoover, John W. Davis, Jouett Shouse, Col. Frank M. Knox, Gov. Alf M. Landon, and Senator L. J. Dickinson.

After the President has delivered his address to the Congress and to the people if the Republican Party desires to request that we allot time to certain speakers for the purpose of combating such portions of his address as leave them in disagreement we should be glad in fairness and in the exercise of our best editorial judgment to allot such available time as we believe befits the circumstances. On the other hand, so that you will understand our position and our reasons for it, I must explain that in the interest of what we judge to be good broadcasting this company cannot accept the principle that all broadcast activities of the Government of the United States or its spokesmen are in the nature of political activities and are to be mathematically balanced by similar broadcasts at similar times by a political party in opposition to the party to which Mr. Roosevelt belongs.

I hope I have made clear to you that we distinguish between the President of the United States and Franklin D. Roosevelt as a candidate for political office and we shall try to apportion time among the political candidates and their supporters with fairness and with good editorial judgment.

WILLIAM S. PALEY,
President, Columbia Broadcasting System.

JANUARY 4, 1936.

Mr. WILLIAM PALEY,
President, Columbia Broadcasting System,
New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. PALEY: Under date of December 27 the first vice president of your company, Mr. Edward Klauber, replied to a letter of Mr. Sabin, December 13, outlining the following policies of the Columbia Broadcasting System:

(1) It is our policy not to sell time for political broadcasts until after the party conventions next summer.

(2) We will not allow dramatization of political issues if time is bought after the conventions.

As the Republican National Committee's plans for the use of radio are completed and time is an essence, I would appreciate your advising me by return mail that the policies outlined in Mr. Klauber's letter are the policies of the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Very truly yours,

HENRY P. FLETCHER.

COLUMBIA BROADCASTING SYSTEM, INC.,
New York, N. Y., January 8, 1936.

Hon. HENRY P. FLETCHER,
Chairman, Republican National Committee,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is to advise you in reply to your letter of January 4 that Mr. Edward Klauber, first vice president of this company, set forth correctly to you the policies of the Columbia Boadcasting System when he advised you:

(1) It is our policy not to sell time for political broadcasts until after the party conventions next summer.

(2) We will not allow dramatization of political issues if time is bought after the conventions.

In Mr. Klauber's letter there was a brief exposition of the company's reasons for adopting these policies, but it has now occurred to me that because of your great interest in broadcasting and your intention to make use of it as one of the media for conducting the Republican campaign it might be well for me to tell you more completely some of the guiding principles which we have adopted for our operations after some considerable experience and a great deal of thought and research into public attitudes.

As you know, we are required under the Communications Act of 1934 to operate as public convenience, interest, or necessity requires. Naturally we wish not only to comply with the spirit and the letter of that act, but to do all things possible within the scope of reasonable and sound business operations to perpetuate the American system of broadcasting.

In trying to conduct our operations on what we conceive to be a sound basis with the foregoing objectives in view we sacrifice every year a good many hundreds of thousands of dollars of revenue and do not sell time to any organization to do with exactly what it pleases. In other words, we have set certain standards which we have greatly refined in the light of experience, and we have sold time only to purchasers admissible under those standards and willing to comply in all particulars with sound program policies. We have allotted time without charge on precisely the same basis and only on the same basis.

I think you will readily see that American broadcasting could not be soundly conducted on any other basis. Its custody is in our hands and in the hands of other broadcasters, and I know you will realize that it is inevitable that from time to time various persons or organizations should seek to put it to uses which are unsuitable. This is sometimes the case among advertisers, because while generally speaking they have raised rather than lowered broadcast standards, there are always those who seek to make selfish or opportunist uses of the medium and who thereupon need to be brought within prescribed and reasonable regulation. The same thing is true of noncommercial organizations seeking to use broadcasting to serve their particular causes.

I think that it must be obvious that, if anything like program balance is to be maintained and experience as to what constitutes good broadcasting is to be applied, the broadcasting system rather than the user or would-be user must dictate program policy. Otherwise it would be impossible to give to the public, in either quality or quantity, anything like a balanced ration of education, discussion, high-class entertainment, popular entertainment, news, and all the other things which the public wants.

In pursuance of the general policy I have outlined in the foregoing paragraph, we quite frequently refuse to take talk programs simply because their addition to the schedule at the moment would, in our judgment, throw our program structure out of balance. I am sure that you will understand that this would be the case practically all of the time if we left to people with all kinds of interests and causes to serve the determination of just how much time should be allotted to the advancement of their projects, and this is true whether the time is given away or sold. It is further true that broadcasting should be a flexible and swiftly responsive medium, and this means that programs of talk and discussion should be put on as news develops and as public interest and attention shifts from one subject or situation to another. It therefore is important that we should not schedule in advance too many programs of this nature in fixed and regular series, because if we do our program structure is thrown all out of gear by the addition of those quick and timely programs. I have dwelt at some length on the general basis of our operations, because I think with these principles in mind you will more readily understand the reasons for the particular decisions which you have asked to have confirmed to you.

With regard to these particular decisions, let me tell you first of all that it is our fixed policy not to sell time for propaganda of any sort. When we think that the public is sufficiently interested in a subject suitable for discussion over the air so that propagandists of opposing sides should be heard, we allot the time without charge. Our decision to forego the immense revenues which could be had from the sale of time for propaganda was based on two main grounds:

(1) We felt that the exercise of the wisest editorial judgment we are able to bring to bear, rather than the ability of others to pay, should govern decisions as to what subjects should be discussed and what subjects lacked sufficient public interest in proportion to other things to merit discussion; and, further, that such editorial judgment should govern the amount of time devoted to such discussion in a given case.

(2) We have an absolute conviction that the air would be misused were such discussion confined to those causes or advocates of causes who were able to pay, and we would very quickly build up an undemocratic and un-American situation in which the air belonged to those with money. This would result in some things not being heard at all and in one side of others being preponderantly presented.

I realize that it is difficult to define precisely what we mean by propaganda; in fact, this company has tried as far as possible to keep away from rigid definitions and arbitrary decisions and to rely upon common sense and the editorial judgment of those who operate it. What I mean in a general way, however, is this: We would not, for example, sell time to the public-utilities holding companies to agitate against proposed legislation restricting or regulating their operations. We would and did give them time in which to argue against such proposed legislation, just as we gave the advocates time to argue in favor of such legislation. On the other hand, if the public utilities wanted to buy time to advertise their goods and services—that is, to promote the use of gas and electricity—we would unhesitatingly sell them available time for such use. To illustrate a little further, we sell time to commercial sponsors for the promotion of the sale of their goods or services or the creation of institutional goodwill, but we do not allow them to use such bought time to agitate for high or low tariffs, changes in national or city or State tax structures, or other things of that nature.

It is in pursuance of this general policy with regard to propaganda that we have decided that we will not now sell time to the Republican Party, the Democratic Party, or any other political organization until after the conventions next summer. It is our intention to continue to devote as much time as seems to us to constitute good broadcasting to the use of political speakers without charge.

I hope I have made clear to you why we will not sell you time at present, and now let me explain our reason for intending to sell it to you, if you wish to buy it, after the conventions. When the candidates are actually nominated and the parties are campaigning for votes, we recognize that a good deal of broadcasting time should, in the public interest, be devoted to political discussion. While we are wholly in accord with the wish of the parties to use such an amount of time—and to use it on a more or less regular basis—we cannot economically afford to allow such use without pay. We shall, therefore, as in past years, treat such broadcasting as commercial and charge our regular rates, selling you available time in such amounts as you desire to buy, provided, of course, your requirements are not so great as in our judgment to upset our program structure.

Now, finally, with regard to our decision not at any time to give to you or to sell to you time for the dramatization of political issues. I believe I have already explained rather fully our reason for never selling time to any person or any organization with full right to make use of that time as he or it sees fit. I trust I have made plain that, on the contrary, we never sell time except for use in conformance with our general program policies, since responsibility for the structure of broadcasting lies with us rather than with those who buy time from us.

Before we decided that we would not allow political parties to present the issues in dramatized form, we considered this question wholly in the light of the public service we might render or the public disservice we might do. We actually listened to one of these dramatizations in audition with great care before we reached our decision. Not a single person in this organization among the numerous ones with whom we discussed it dissented from the view that such dramatizations by the political parties should not go on the air over the Columbia Broadcasting System. Since the reasons for this decision were stated to you concisely in Mr. Klauber's letter of December 27, 1935, I repeat that portion of the letter here in order to make this a complete document:

"Appeals to the electorate should be intellectual and not based on emotion, passion, or prejudice. We recognize that even the oratorical discussion of campaign issues can be to a degree stamped with the aforementioned flaws, but we are convinced that dramatizations would throw the radio campaign almost wholly over to the emotional side. Then, too, we believe that the dramatic method by its very nature would tend to overemphasize incidents of minor importance and significance, simply because of the dramatic value. While we realize that no approach to the electorate is absolutely ideal, we believe American voters have long been trained to discriminate among the assertions of orators whereas we do not believe they could discriminate fairly among dramatizations, so that the turn of national issues might well depend on the skill of warring dramatists rather than on the merits of the issue debated."

In conclusion, let me say that Columbia will continue to operate on a completely nonpartisan basis, and let me assure you that our reasons for not being able completely to meet the wishes of the Republican National Committee with respect to the sale of time now and with respect to dramatizations, are solely based upon the most reasoned and dispassionate beliefs about good broadcasting service to the American public that we are able to bring to bear upon the situation.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM S. PALEY.

JANUARY 13, 1936.

Mr. WILLIAM S. PALEY,
President, Columbia Broadcasting System,
485 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. PALEY: Replying to your letter of January 4 and your telegram of the 2d in reply to my telegram of January 1 with reference to political broadcasting, I do not for a moment question your right to determine for yourselves what policies should be exercised by the Columbia Broadcasting System in the use of its facilities. I cannot, however, free myself of the impression that the attitude you have taken is affected and perhaps involuntarily controlled by the political party in power, which regulates the issuance of your licenses.

The Republican National Committee has made two requests of your company. The first is for free facilities comparable to those you have afforded Democratic spokesmen, including the President, now an acknowledged candidate. The second is to rent and pay for such time on the air as is arranged for other programs sponsored by advertisers.

I believe your policy "not to sell time for political broadcasts until after the regular party conventions next summer" will leave in the minds of the American public the distinct impression that you are either exercising an unwarranted degree of censorship or that you fear punitive action by the Federal Communications Commission.

I am informed that both the National Broadcasting Co. and Columbia Broadcasting System cleared the air of all programs on the night of January 3 and January 8 for the President so that the facilities of some 180 stations were made available for what were in large part political talks of a candidate. I assume this was free time, and the question arises, Was this in the nature of a donation to a political party by the radio companies or by the corporations sponsoring programs which were displaced by the President's speeches?

It seems to me that the services of the great radio chains should be as nonpartisan and free from governmental domination as are great news services, like the A. P., U. P., International News, etc., and give both sides an absolutely equal break.

Now, as to the refusal of both the major broadcasting systems to rent or lease us time on their networks prior to the national conventions. It is precisely because the Republican National Committee desires to bring home to the voters the effect of the administration's aims and policies and the vital issues affecting the very foundations of constitutional government before the heat and furv of the political campaign that we have planned to take advantage now of modern radio technique to convey our message. Your letter speaks of objections to the use of dramatic sketches in political programs. So long as these are truly represented—as they would be—by the announcer as dramatic sketches, as is done in the presentation of commercial programs, I fail to see any legitimate reason for your refusing them, nor have we any intention of cluttering up or overcrowding your facilities.

The statement in your letter that "appeals to the electorate should be intellectual and not based on emotion, passion, or prejudice" seems almost funny in the light of the impassioned appeal to class prejudice made by the President in his congressional broadcast on January 3. To my mind the use of what you are pleased to call your "editorial judgment" amounts in practice to censorship.

The two great systems enjoy, under the 90-day license system imposed by the Federal Communications Commission, a precarious lease of the great theater of the air. You decline to open the doors of this theater to those in opposition to the policies of the administration unless your "editorial judgment" approves the program to be presented.

In view of the public interest involved in this question of the freedom of the air, I am giving a copy of this letter to the press.

Yours truly,

HENRY P. FLETCHER.

[Copy of letter from William S. Paley, Columbia Broadcasting System, to Chairman Fletcher]

Hon. HENRY P. FLETCHER,
Chairman, Republican National Committee,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FLETCHER: Your letter to me, dated and made public today, needs little answer other than the facts although I think it is only fair to state at the outset that you are under a misapprehension in all of your assumptions that the Federal Communications Commission could—even if it would—take punitive action against us for political reasons or that we live in fear of this administration or any other. There is nothing in the Federal Communications Law which would allow the Commission to act from partisan political motives, and, if it did so act, its judgments would very promptly be reversed by the Federal courts. Moreover, if this company were subject to such domination by any political party as is implied by you, the American people would be served so shabbily that I should lose all interest in the conduct of this business.

You have never asked us for free facilities and been refused. What you did ask was for us to assume in advance that an address by the President of the United States to the people of America and their Congress was a political speech, and to set aside in advance of the delivery of that speech comparable time for a Republican answer. We refused to treat the President of the United States other than as the President of the United States and shall continue so to refuse. We made plain to you, and now repeat to you, that we shall distinguish between the President as President and Franklin D. Roosevelt as a candidate for office. We told you that after the President had spoken we would be glad, upon request from you, to allot time that in our judgment befitted the circumstances. Since the President delivered his message we have asked you to state your desires for such time, and you have failed to do so. You, therefore, are wholly inaccurate when you try to present this incident in the light of a refusal of time on our part.

Your whole letter is worded as if we were treating one political party on a different basis than the other. The fact is that we refuse to sell time to any political party before the conventions, and we give time to both. I again explain to you that this refusal, which costs us hundreds of thousands of dollars every year, is based upon our belief that we are charged with a public duty to allot time for the free discussion of controversial public questions, including politics, and we refuse to sell time for this purpose.

We believe that American broadcasting would be greatly injured if we did allot such time on a paid basis and allowed moneyed organizations or interests to dominate the discussion of controversial public issues. We believe the American public will uphold us in our view that our own editorial judgment, rather than the availability of funds in the hands of others, should regulate the amount of time given to the various sides of any discussion, and we believe the public will agree that such discussions should be in proportion to the general public interest in the subject and that there should be due regard to the necessity for maintaining general program balance.

You cannot with justice accuse us of censorship nor should you assail our editorial judgment unless and until you are prepared to cite specific instances or to point to what you judge to be some general unfairness on our part. These are the facts with regard to our political broadcasts in recent months:

From October 2 to January 11 the Columbia Boardcasting System presented 16 political addresses by Republican spokesmen and 13 by Democratic spokesmen. During this time Columbia made several offers to the Republican Party of its facilities for their speakers, which were not utilized, notably on December 16 for you yourself to summarize results of the National Republican Committee meeting in Washington. From January 14 to January 29 of this year Columbia has scheduled four addresses by Republican spokesmen and three by Democratic spokesmen. We have besides frequently given time to opponents of the President within the Democratic Party, to speakers nominated by the Liberty League, and many other organizations in general disagreement with the President's policies.

I am glad to answer your question as to whether or not the time we allotted for the President's speech was a donation to a political party. It certainly was not. It was a donation to the American people. It has always been our policy to make time available for the President of the United States when he wished to address the Nation. We followed this policy through two Republican administrations and we follow it now.

I completely and thoroughly agree with you that we should be as nonpartisan as the press associations in giving both sides "an absolutely equal break." At the same time, I assure you that no reputable or responsible press association is run on a mathematical basis under which so many words on a given day are allotted to each political party. The press associations follow the breaks of the news and the shifting of public interest from issue to issue and from person to person. We would not be doing anything but an automaton's job if we tried to run broadcasting otherwise.

I say to you now that when the campaign is over I am absolutely convinced that you and all responsible members of your party will be satisfied that we have been scrupulously fair, just as we have been in the past, and I do not think you should impugn our fairness until you have evidence to the contrary.

We have no quarrel with your desire to present the issues to the voters "before the heat and fury of the political campaign." It is our full intention to allow you ample time for such presentation, but we must persist in our refusal to take money for it, because we do not believe it would be sound broadcasting to do so.

I disagree with you flatly that dramatizations of the political issues are unobjectionable provided they are tagged as dramatizations. We here at Columbia still believe that the issues should be discussed intellectually by responsible and identified speakers and not fictionalized. I repeat to you that the dramatic method in the hands of skilled dramatists will serve to confuse issues, to overemphasize minor points which have dramatic value, and generally to distort political discussion.

You say that we have "a precarious lease of the great theater of the air" and that we declined to open the doors of this theater to those in opposition to the policies of the administration unless our "editorial judgment" approved the program to be presented. We have not closed the door. We have only refused to accept money for opening it, and have declined, in respect to dramatized broadcasts, to permit a method of broadcasting which we believe would be injurious to the American public.

Finally, I agree with you that the system of short-term licenses under which American broadcasting operates could be very greatly improved. Broadcasting should unquestionably be put on a more permanent basis. But the entire record of this company refutes your charge that the present system has forced us into any sort of partisanship.

As long as the custody of an important part of American broadcasting remains in our hands we intend, I repeat to you, to accept our responsibilities and to discharge them as honestly and as largely in the public interest and in the interest of good broadcasting as we know how.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM S. PALEY.

[Copy of letter from Chairman Fletcher to William S. Paley, president, Columbia Broadcasting System]

JANUARY 14, 1936.

Mr. WILLIAM S. PALEY,
President, Columbia Broadcasting System,
485 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. PALEY: I think our correspondence plants the issue squarely before the American people and I am willing to leave it to their calm and unbiased judgment whether or not, on the record thus made, your system is or is not exercising censorship of the air.

There is, however, just one point in your letter I desire to answer. You say:

"We told you that after the President had spoken we would be glad, upon request from you, to allot time that in our judgment befitted the circumstances. Since the President delivered his message we have asked you to state your desires for such time and you failed to do so. You, therefore, are wholly inaccurate when you try to present this incident in the light of a refusal of time on our part."

I felt this concession so unsatisfactory and hedged about that I did not immediately ask your system to allot us time that in your judgment befitted the circumstances.

However, in the course of the political campaign, which was opened by the President's congressional broadcast, I shall hope that Republican speakers will receive comparable time at equally desirable hours over comparable stations as may be granted to the spokesmen of the party in power. You will receive requests to this effect from time to time.

Yours very truly,

HENRY P. FLETCHER.

DECEMBER 13, 1935.

Mr. M. H. AYLESWORTH,
President, National Broadcasting Co.,
30 Rockefeller Plaza, New York City.

MY DEAR MR. AYLESWORTH: The Republican National Committee is preparing its plans for radio broadcasting. These plans contemplate the purchase of the following time over the National Broadcasting Co.'s networks and owned and managed stations:

One-half hour weekly red or blue network plus selected supplementary groups and certain individual stations where it is possible to obtain stations without taking entire groups.

One-half hour weekly basic red or blue network, with possibly certain selected stations on the N. B. C. basic supplementary group.

Weather reports, time signals, 1-minute announcements, 5-minute programs, 15-minute, and half-hour programs where such service or facilities are available for commercial sponsorship on stations owned and operated by the National Broadcasting Co.

Starting date: Sometime prior to June 1, 1936. Possibly January.

Programs: The programs to be used will be such vehicles as the Republican National Committee may in its opinion deem to be proper for carrying the Republican message to the people.

As I have a meeting in Washington Monday morning on the question of plans and budgets, it will be appreciated if you will advise me by return special-delivery letter so I may advise the Honorable Henry P. Fletcher, chairman of the Republican National Committee, as to the acceptance of your company of this business when, as, and if offered on the above basis.

Thanking you in advance for a prompt reply, I am,

Cordially yours,

THOMAS G. SABIN.

NATIONAL BROADCASTING CO., INC.,
New York, December 14, 1935.

Mr. THOMAS G. SABIN,
Republican National Committee, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SABIN: I am at a loss to understand your letter of December 13 to Mr. Aylesworth regarding the purchase of time for political broadcasts in the light of our company policy not to sell time for political broadcasts prior to the official conventions. After the national conventions designate their candidates we will sell time to the national committees when available and possible.

Prior to the convention, as you well know, it is our desire and intention to make it possible for responsible spokesmen to discuss their views on the major issue confronting the country.

In order to simplify this procedure as much as possible, we are reserving certain time each week for such discussions, and assignment of these periods will be made as the individual cases arise.

Cordially yours,

ALFRED H. MORTON.

[Copy of telegram from Chairman Fletcher to the president, National Broadcasting Co., New York, N. Y.]

JANUARY 1, 1936.

The press announces that arrangements have been made, or are being made, by your company to broadcast over a Nation-wide hook-up the speech to be delivered by the President to the Congress on Friday night. If this be true, as chairman of the Republican National Committee, I respectfully request that your company allot on some closely following day the same amount of time over the same stations at the same hour of the day given to Mr. Roosevelt for a broadcast of comment on the issues confronting the next session of Congress by Republican spokesmen, to be selected by me after consultation with the Republican leaders of both Houses of Congress.

The essence of American democracy and free speech is fairness. If you grant my request, it will demonstrate that you are in no way influenced by fear of the party in power.

The President is a candidate for reelection this year. The House of Representatives and the United States Senate have only once before set aside their rules to have a special night session for a Presidential address. That was the memorable occasion in April 1917, when war was declared.

So far as the American press is concerned, it would print the text of the President's message irrespective of the hour of the joint session, and the Members of Congress would quite as readily attend a day session in the regular course.

The President's decision to dramatize his message and to bring down to the level of a political speech his constitutional right and duty to address the Congress on the state of the Union is understandable in the light of past performances.

It is apparent, therefore, that the President considers the Members of the Senate and the House as only incidentally his audience, and that he will be addressing himself to the electorate as a part of his campaign for reelection. Of course, he has a perfect right to do so if the Congress sets aside the time it wishes to receive his message.

We are not objecting to the program outlined but merely requesting an equal opportunity to place our case before the people with the same facilities, the same stations, and, potentially, the same audience.

The political character of the speeches by members of the administration over the radio should be recognized for what they are. Both sides of the vital current issues should be presented to the American jury for their own judgment. Unless the party in opposition be granted equal facilities, the dominant party can control the instrumentalities of communication in an effort to perpetuate itself in power.

I would appreciate a prompt response so that I may arrange for speakers to present the Republican point of view.

HENRY P. FLETCHER.
Chairman, Republican National Committee.

[Copy of telegram from M. H. Aylesworth, National Broadcasting Co., to Chairman Fletcher]

JANUARY 2, 1936.

Answering your telegram of January 1 to the National Broadcasting Co., which was printed in the morning newspapers today, we would inform you that the President of the United States is delivering his message to Congress in an evening session, which meeting of Congress will be broadcast by the National Broadcasting Co. to the American public at 9 o'clock eastern standard time on Friday, January 3. In accordance with the established policy of the National Broadcasting Co. of making its facilities available to responsible speakers for discussion of both sides of public questions affecting the national welfare we are glad to afford the representative or representatives of the Republican Party whom you may select the facilities of the National Broadcasting Co. for such discussions from time to time. If you will designate your speaker or speakers and advise us immediately, we will make early reservations of time.

M. H. AYLESWORTH,
National Broadcasting Co.

JANUARY 4, 1936.

Mr. M. H. AYLESWORTH,
Vice Chairman, National Broadcasting Co., New York City.

DEAR MR. AYLESWORTH: Under date of December 13, Mr. Sabin, director of the radio division of the Republican National Committee, wrote you outlining the plans of this committee for the use of the radio and requested that you advise him as to the acceptance by your company of certain business as outlined in his letter when, as, and if offered. Subsequently, on December 14, Mr. Alfred Morton, whom I understand to be the manager of the N. B. C. program department, replied to Mr. Sabin stating in substance that it is the policy of the National Broadcasting Co. not to sell time for political broadcasts prior to the national conventions. Mr. Morton, however, did not reply to that portion of Mr. Sabin's letter with regard to the right of the Republican Party to use any purchased or free time for such program vehicles as the Republican National Committee might in its own opinion deem to be proper for the purpose of carrying the message of the Republican Party to the people.

As time is of the essence and the plans of this committee have been completed regarding the present use of the radio, I would appreciate receiving from yourself verification of Mr. Morton's statement, as contained in his letter of December 14, to the effect that it is the policy of the National Broadcasting Co. not to sell time to political parties prior to their respective conventions, and also, in view of the fact that Mr. Morton did not reply to the above-mentioned portion of Mr. Sabin's letter, I would like to have an answer from yourself as to this phase as well.

May I have the courtesy of a reply by return mail?

Yours very truly,

HENRY P. FLETCHER.

HON. HENRY P. FLETCHER,

Barr Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FLETCHER: I have reviewed, as you suggested in your letter of January 4, 1936, and as you subsequently asked me to do, the policy of the National Broadcasting Co., with respect to the programs which you offered to us on behalf of the National Republican Committee, and for which you offered us compensation. I have also listened to the recorded presentations of the first two acts of the dramatized political programs entitled "Liberty at the Crossroads", which you submitted to us.

I take this opportunity to advise you of the policies of the National Broadcasting Co. on programs of political interest.

In line with its responsibility to the public, the National Broadcasting Co. seeks to have presented to radio listeners the various sides of political issues, and to have them presented fairly and adequately. The company tries to render such service on the basis of straightforward statement of fact and opinion openly and directly made by responsible spokesmen.

The National Broadcasting Co. sincerely strives to reflect the thought of the religious, political, social, and cultural life of our country. In fairness to the public, which in the final analysis is the judge of the programs broadcast, this company must accept the responsibility for the manner in which its facilities are utilized. It must, therefore, maintain the right to exercise the necessary judgment and discretion with respect to programs.

In cooperation with its associated and independently owned stations from coast to coast, this company has uniformly allotted a reasonable amount of time for the discussion of public affairs and controversial issues. This has been done on a nonpartisan basis and, prior to the regular national conventions, no charge has been made even for political broadcasts.

The programs which you have offered to us, using actors to give dramatic skits on the air, involve the fictionalizing of important political issues now before the country. These presentations would violate the policies upon which the National Broadcasting Co. has based its service to the radio-listening public. To accept such dramatic programs as you have offered would place the discussion of vital political and national issues on the basis of dramatic license, rather than upon a basis of responsibly stated fact or opinion.

For the reasons stated above, we must decline to accept the dramatized political programs and the compensation you have offered us, but we shall be glad to follow our established policy of furnishing to political parties the opportunity to present the views of their responsible spokesmen on the public questions involved. This we shall continue to do from time to time as the facilities of the National Broadcasting Co. can be made available.

Very truly yours,

LENOX R. LOHR.

JANUARY 13, 1936.

Mr. LENOX R. LOHR,

President, the National Broadcasting Co., New York City.

DEAR SIR: This is to acknowledge your letter of January 8 and also the recent telegram from Mr. Aylesworth in reply to my message of January 1 with respect to the request for facilities for our spokesmen comparable to the facilities you afforded on January 3 to the Democratic Party.

I am enclosing herewith a copy of a letter I have just addressed to William S. Paley, president of the Columbia Broadcasting Co., which I would respectfully request that you regard as addressed also to your company, inasmuch as the stand taken in these matters by the National Broadcasting Co. is virtually the same as that adopted by the Columbia Broadcasting System.

Yours truly,

HENRY P. FLETCHER.

P. S.—In view of the public interest involved in this question of the freedom of the air, I am giving a copy of this letter to the press.—H. P. F.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have today introduced a resolution, and I ask unanimous consent to insert the resolution in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

Joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to communicate with the Governments of Italy and Ethiopia asking them to declare at least a 60-day truce, and for other purposes

Whereas the Governments of Italy and Ethiopia have been at war for about 5 months; and

Whereas hundreds of unfortunate Italians and unfortunate Ethiopians have been killed and hundreds have been permanently injured; and

Whereas the indications are if Italy and Ethiopia do not soon cease hostilities other nations will become involved in the conflict; and

Whereas if other nations become involved in the war, thousands of human lives will be destroyed and billions of dollars will be expended, and the amount of money which would be expended by every nation participating in the war would have to be borne by the poor people, who were in no way responsible for the war; and

Whereas if a sincere effort would be made by the officials of the governments of the world to end the hostilities now existing between Ethiopia and Italy, unquestionably the conflict would cease and a world war would be avoided: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States be authorized to send a communication to Premier Benito Mussolini, of Italy, and Emperor Haile Selassie, of Ethiopia, asking them to declare a truce for at least 60 days; and to also send a communication to every other nation in the world inviting them to participate in a conference, which conference shall be held for the purpose to provide ways and means to make peace between Italy, Ethiopia, and other nations now engaged in war.

This resolution shall become effective within 5 days after its passage.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, so that no one will be under any misapprehension as to my attitude on the administration farm program, let me say first of all that I voted for the Agricultural Adjustment Act and, secondly, I voted for the Agricultural Adjustment Act amendments in the last session of the Congress, hoping thereby to go along with the sentiment that has been articulated among the farmers in my district and seeking in my humble way to do something for agriculture; but I have contended repeatedly that there are some inconsistencies in that program, and one of them is becoming so acute at the present time that I feel it ought to be brought to the attention of the House.

It occurs to me that with the right hand at the present time the administration is reaching out and seeking to lend aid and succor and assistance to the farmers, most of whose leaders are congregated in the National Capital at the present time, and with the left hand the same administration is seeking to give the farmers a little sock on the nose.

To get at this situation we must begin at the beginning, and I am pleased to see that at least one member of the Ways and Means Committee is here, because what I have to say relates very particularly to a measure that was enacted in the last session of this Congress known as the Federal Alcohol Administration Act.

When the N. R. A. was invalidated by the Supreme Court, the so-called code set up to control the distilling, distribution, and sale of beverages of the country known as the Federal Alcohol Control Administration fell along with it. It became necessary for Congress to provide a constructive substitute setting up the control, manufacture, sale, and distribution of malt and distilled beverages.

That act is operative at the present time, and until recently was under the administration of a distinguished, able, and conscientious gentleman from New York by the name of Judge Hoyt.

Under the Federal Alcohol Administration you will remember that in the discussion on the floor we gave a lot of attention and placed a lot of emphasis on the fact that Congress very properly manifested a deep solicitude for the protection of the consumer, the protection of Federal revenue, and for the orderly conduct of the distilled- and malted-beverage business, and accordingly there were written into that measure many provisions relating to branding, marking, labeling, and advertising of distilled spirits, and conferred upon the new F. A. A. agency authority to promulgate rules and regulations for that purpose.

This Federal Alcohol Administration held hearings last fall and submitted proposed regulations covering the distribution, labeling, marking, branding, and so forth, of liquors, and one of these provisions that impressed me very much was the fact that after all the discussion and all the solicitude and emphasis that was placed upon it on the floor, they sought to emasculate some provisions of that bill by permitting the distillers of beverages which contained neutral spirits made from a thick, dirty, scummy sirup, known to the trade as "blackstrap" molasses, and imported in huge quantities from Cuba, Puerto Rico, and other offshore islands, to use the words "cane products" in informing the consuming public of the materials from which such beverages were produced.

The term "cane products" would be a euphonious and beguiling term which most certainly would conceal the real nature of the base from which a part of the ingredients in the bottle had been produced.

Now, to the average citizen, the term "cane products" means sugar and nothing more. It does not mean this dark, dirty molasses that comes into this country by the millions of gallons every year and displaces corn in the distilling industry. I sent a considerable letter to Administrator Hoyt at the time, but those proposed regulations went through, and I am informed they went to the Treasury Department of the United States and have been gone over carefully, and I find that the Treasury Department of the United States takes the attitude, in view of the provision that exists in the Revenue Act of 1918, that there can be no discrimination against any distilled beverage, irrespective of what we wrote into the F. A. A. Act last year, because of section 605 of the revenue act. That section provides that—

All distilled spirits or wines taxable under the section shall be subject to uniform regulation concerning the use thereof in the manufacture, blending, compounding, mixing, marketing, branding, and sale of whisky and rectified spirits, and no discrimination whatsoever shall be made by reason of the difference in the character of material from which the same may have been produced.

Let me suggest to the membership of this Committee that ever since the Pure Food and Drugs Act of 1906 the Department of Agriculture has been insisting that if anyone markets a whisky that is a compounded whisky the label must recite that fact. We have had a succession of opinions, beginning with the noted opinion of President Taft, as to what constitutes whisky, and he said explicitly and unequivocably that whisky is a distillate made from grain base. We have that fortified by the opinions of two Attorneys General of the United States, and yet here the Treasury of the United States at the present time, if they follow the opinion of their counsel as to their interpretation of the Revenue Act of 1918, would absolutely emasculate the F. A. A. Act passed by this Congress last year and for all practical purposes will make it possible to place on the American market, obtainable by and accessible to every consumer of distilled beverages, not only gin, for instance, made of neutral spirits which have been distilled from molasses, instead of corn, but whisky as well. If such is the case, what will be the effect of such administration of the F. A. A. Act so far as it relates to agriculture? It means that great inroads will be made upon the farmers' distilling outlet for grain and gradually curtail that outlet with its resulting detrimental effect upon grain prices. Everything which destroys demand for grain obviously operates to affect and lower the price and it constitutes an injustice to the grain farmers of the Nation.

What did we do prior to repeal of the eighteenth amendment? Along with a great many others, we went up and down the land and promised solemnly and profoundly to the farmers that if they would march to the polls and help repeal the eighteenth amendment it would expand the industrial outlet for grain, it would make possible the use of millions of bushels of corn and rye for the manufacture of bourbon, rye, scotch whisky, and all those other delightful beverages that intrigue the palates of the American public.

How do those promises square with the present administrative action, if taken. If they stand by their contemplated ruling and give effect to the proposed regulations, it is like slapping the American farmer in the face and saying to him that, while we did make that proposal to him prior to repeal of the eighteenth amendment, we feel somehow now that because of some abstruse paragraph in a law that was written 18 years ago we cannot give currency and we cannot give effect to the provisions of the F. A. A. Act that was so roundly discussed in the Congress last year, in which we sought to give to the farmer protection and to give the consumer protection. I say that if that is put into effect, how can the administration justify its present position of wanting to aid and assist the farmer with this hand and with the other hand giving him a little, gentle, yet emphatic, poke in the nose? The thing must be cured. It can be cured by repealing that paragraph of section 605 of the Revenue Act of 1918—and I shall introduce a three-line bill this afternoon to that effect—but it occurs to me that it is the responsibility of the administration which put the F. A. A. Act on the books and to get behind this repealer and see that it is inscribed on the statute books without delay.

In the course of the extended discussion of the F. A. A. Act on the floor of this House we made an effort to write a restrictive amendment into the bill protecting the farmers of this country against the inroads of imported molasses, but, unfortunately, it was defeated. At that time we felt that it would affect only gin, in view of the general opinion after the momentous opinion of President Taft years ago that whiskey was a distillate from a grain base.

Now, it would appear that the present interpretation of the revenue-act provision of 1918, which provides for uniform regulations and prevents discrimination, no matter "what the character of the material from which same shall have been produced", not only opens up vast possibilities of producing compounded whiskies containing spirits made from molasses but even presents the possibility of negativing the provisions of the Pure Food and Drug Act of 1906, which has heretofore been rather uniformly followed and supported.

I have always consistently supported farm legislation, and cannot escape the conviction that it is the very acme of hokum to reduce acreage and reduce production with one program and then destroy the farmers' markets with still another program, which lets down the bars on blackstrap imports which are directly competitive with grain.

I sincerely hope that the proper committee of this House will see the wisdom of preserving the gains that were made in the F. A. A. Act by supporting and expediting action on this bill to repeal the appropriate section of the Revenue Act of 1918. [Applause.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WEARIN].

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I have listened with considerable astonishment, in fact, amazement, this afternoon to the remarks that have been made on the floor of the House, criticizing the New Deal. My good friend the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN], who has just preceded me, indicated we were extending favors to the farmer with one hand and slapping him in the face with the other. If that were true it would be at least one more helping hand than the American farmer received under the administration that preceded that of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Lest we forget, I want to recall to your minds the situation that prevailed in the United States prior to March 1933.

It so happens that I come from a rural district and live on an Iowa farm. Just before I came to Washington the first time in March 1933, corn was changing hands on our farm and every farm in that territory at 9 and 10 cents a bushel. I stood on the streets of a small town in my district during my congressional campaign and an old farmer in that territory of some 50 or 60 years of age came to me with tears in his eyes and said, "Mr. WEARIN, if you are elected to Congress, for God's sake, in some way, do something for American agriculture. I have just been forced, because of the banking crisis, to sell my heavy hogs to the local buyer at 90 cents per 100 pounds."

Ninety cents per hundred pounds for pork! Four dollars and fifty cents for a 500-pound hog. No producer of hogs needs challenge that statement today by telling me that a 500-pound hog is not a top hog, because I have marketed too many of them; but I ask you to market a 500-pound hog today at the present market price of pork and see what he will bring you. During the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt he would net from thirty-five to forty or forty-five dollars at least. During those trying times of 1930, 1931, and 1932 I saw many a desolate wagon train leaving the gates of Iowa farms, going out into the highways, driven off of the homes of their ancestors because of the ruinous price of farm products that had brought them down to the lowest ebb in the history of American agriculture. In some instances prices were lower than they had been for more than 300 years, which far antedates agricultural production in America.

That was the state of the American producer in 1930, 1931, and 1932 during the administration of Herbert Hoover. So it is rather astonishing to me this afternoon, as I sit here in this Chamber listening to the lamentations of the opposition, from whose views I might determine that American agriculture was today destitute—destitute, with corn selling in my district for 50 and 55 cents a bushel. I paid 53½ cents for shelled corn delivered in our bins on our farm about 4 weeks ago before I left for Washington. I paid on the Omaha Livestock Market $7.40 per 100 pounds for feeders to put into the feed yard that are being fed on the place today. I paid $7.50 a head for hogs to put into that feed yard that are being fed there today. Before I came here in 1933 I bought a respectable load of feeding cattle, almost as good as the ones in the yard today, for $3.60 a hundred pounds. I bought hundred-pound shoats for $2.65 per head delivered at the gates of my farm.

Then there are those in the American Congress who try to tell us that American agriculture is no better today at the end of 3 years of the administration of our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. It is inconceivable to those of us who live on American farms today and who are buying and selling American farm products as our sole business.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEARIN. I yield; yes.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I just want to refresh the gentleman's recollection. The gentleman has referred to the lamentations of the opposition to the administration in Congress. Does the gentleman recall that in 1928 at numerous times the candidate of the Republican Party for President had thanked God that through the instrumentality of the Republican Party and its policies poverty had been abolished and American homes had been protected?

Mr. WEARIN. Oh, I remember it only too vividly, because agriculture was the only business I had from which I was afforded an opportunity to make a living in 1928, as it is today. So that picture is just a little too familiar for pleasant recollections.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEARIN. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Is it the opinion of the farmers and others in the gentleman's State that the President is responsible for what he just referred to as better conditions among the farmers?

Mr. WEARIN. I think it is the decided opinion of the farmers of Iowa that had it not been for the Agricultural Adjustment Act, had it not been for the 45-cent loan on corn when it was selling for about 20 cents per bushel, had it not been for the reduction of interest rates on farm mortgages, under the leadership of Franklin D. Roosevelt, had it not been for the many other features of this program, American agriculture would not be at its present level of reasonable prosperity.

Mr. MOTT. Then can the gentleman tell us why it is that the people of his State, according to the recent poll conducted by the Literary Digest, are opposed to the New Deal very emphatically?

Mr. WEARIN. I think, if the gentleman wants to lead me into that discussion, that the question as worded by the Literary Digest was one of the most unfair presentations of a program that I ever heard of. [Applause.] Let us put that question to the American people at the next election on the ballot and permit them to choose between conditions as they are under Roosevelt and as they were under Hoover.

Mr. MOTT. What does the gentleman think is unfair about the question?

Mr. WEARIN. It took into consideration every single, solitary thing that has been done under this program, and the President himself has told the country that if he could have a batting average of 80 percent he would be doing pretty well, and I think so myself. When we look back and see the desperate condition of the country at the time he took office, I think the market sheets in every newspaper in America today will indicate that he has had better than an 80-percent average.

Mr. MOTT. But the opinion expressed by the gentleman's people does not indicate that he has an 80-percent batting average.

Mr. WEARIN. Well, let us permit them to decide that at the polls. They will tell us if they want to continue with Roosevelt or go back to Hoover. I have answered three or four questions for the gentleman now, so he will have to get some time from his own side if he wants to make a speech. I want to continue my remarks.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there just in that connection for me to make a suggestion?

Mr. WEARIN. Very well.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] will get the stock-market reports for today, he will see that there are stocks listed today, like the Texas Corporation, for instance, that are higher than they had been at any time during Mr. Hoover's administration.

Mr. MOTT. Yet the stock-market dealers are just as much against the New Deal as the farmers.

Mr. BLANTON. I challenge that assertion.

Mr. WEARIN. Perhaps so, but I am interested in the farmers and common people of the country. The gentleman will have to conduct his controversy in his own time. I want to use what remains of mine.

I yield for one more question to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I will not ask a question, but I simply wish to make an observation, that these benefits to the farmers, not only in my State but through the Nation, are reflected also in another agency, and that is in the loans made to the farmers through the Federal land bank. Nine thousand men in West Virginia would have lost their farms without this administration's loans through its agencies.

Mr. WEARIN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WEARIN. The gentleman from West Virginia has asked a very timely question, coming as it does at this point of my discussion, because I wanted to touch for a moment upon this particular phase of agricultural relief. It will be remembered that under the Republican administration the farmers in his State of West Virginia, in my State of Iowa, and in every State in the Union were paying as high as 5-percent interest on their indebtedness; but under the terms of the Farm Credit Administration, as revised by the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt, this interest rate has been reduced to 3½ percent for this year, 4 percent for next year, and 4 percent for the succeeding year.

So this in itself, mind you, represents a substantial saving. A reduction of 1 percent on Federal land-bank indebtedness means a saving to the American farmers of approximately $20,000,000 in interest rates. No wonder the purchasing power of American agriculture is up. A farm-implement factory in my territory which 2 years ago had a corporal's guard stowed around in the corners to protect its property is today operating on a 24-hour schedule with a full force of men and are behind in filling their orders. This is only one of many things that indicate a more profitable American agriculture as a result of the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Now I must pause for a moment to remark that the farmers of my territory, as evidenced by the telegrams and letters I am receiving in my office, were shocked at the loss of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration. In every one of those inquiries is contained the statement that they sincerely trust this administration will go on with another program equally as satisfactory and profitable to their welfare as was the A. A. A. I am replying to them that the administration, the leadership of the Congress, and those of us who are vitally interested in the welfare of the producers of this country are cooperating in a herculean effort to cope with the immediate situation and go on with another program as satisfactory as the present. The fact that we delivered the goods in the spring of 1933 ought to assure producers that we will do as well by them again, which is more than has ever been done for them by any previous administration.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question at this point—not a political question at all?

Mr. WEARIN. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield. The gentleman has asked several questions. He can get time in his own right.

No wonder they are making such requests of their representatives in Congress. American farmers realize what has been done for them. Just this morning I selected the following statement from the United States Department of Commerce in the December issue of A Survey of Current Business. It reads as follows and amounts to only half a dozen lines:

> Expansion in industrial pay rolls has been accompanied by a greater than seasonal increase in farm incomes during the heavy marketing season. This, again, has provided the farmer with a considerably larger margin above his fixed expenditures, with the result that retail sales in rural areas have increased very substantially this year.

This is no one's opinion; this is a statement from the United States Department of Commerce Reports.

I selected from a little file of embarrassing newspaper clippings I enjoy preserving as time goes along the following with the heading—

Farmers in this county—

Referring to the largest county in my congressional district—

to receive over $2,000,000—

Referring, of course, to the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

This clipping coming from my district says that Iowa farmers are $12,000,000 richer, despite the drought that descended upon them year before last, when they suffered almost a complete and total loss of crops.

At this point in the RECORD I shall insert a statement indicating the total amount of corn loans received by the farmers of the respective counties of my district, and also a statement of the corn-hog benefits received up to July of 1934 in my district, which has materially enhanced the total farm income from my State during 1934 and 1935. [Applause.]

During that trying period of 1933 to April 30, 1934, approximately the following amounts of money were loaned on corn in the respective counties of our congressional district:

County	Number of borrowers	Amount
Adair	900	$510,000
Adams	600	225,000
Audubon	800	425,000
Cass	850	450,000
Fremont	1,350	1,350,000
Guthrie	1,050	600,000
Harrison	1,250	850,000
Mills	1,550	1,000,000
Montgomery	900	675,000
Page	950	650,000
Pottawattamie	3,000	1,300,000
Shelby	1,100	600,000
Taylor	200	100,000
Total	14,500	8,735,000

During almost that same trying period, including the backwash of the depression that ruined thousands of farmers before the advent of the New Deal, I find that up to July 9, 1934, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration made the following payments to farmers in our congressional district:

County:	Amount
Adair	$71,745.60
Adams	36,061.10
Audubon	221,947.20
Cass	3,380.75
Fremont	20,228.55
Guthrie	4,962.10
Harrison	45,489.10
Mills	2,051.90
Montgomery	34,748.65
Pottawattamie	2,295.00
Shelby	110,085.30
Taylor	13,024.85

I cite the above amounts not because of the volume of money they represent, as far greater sums were sent into the Seventh Congressional District of Iowa, but simply to illustrate that the Roosevelt administration got into action immediately and started doing some material things for American farmers before a year had passed. In the face of the above facts it is difficult to understand how even those who stand at the wailing wall, without a single constructive suggestion to offer as a reason for changing our course, can say that we have not redeemed our campaign pledge to place agriculture on a plane of equality with other lines of enterprise.

I would remind the Congress and the Nation that agriculture throughout the length and breadth of the land is unquestionably better off than it was in 1932 in spite of the criticism that is being leveled at the program from this floor and through the columns of hostile newspapers, the editors of which might very well read the market sheets in their own publications. In a copy of our Midwestern market newspaper for January 1, 1936, I found the following headlines:

All classes of livestock show substantial advances. * * *
Cattle values best in 5 years.
Hog prices not far from normal during past 12 months.
Last half of year sees lambs soar to highest since 1930.
Omaha business has best year since 1929.
Steel pay rolls near peak year as output expands 31 percent.
Farm land attracts more buyers in 1935.

And—

Expect stock rise to continue into 1936.

The farmers of the entire United States can be reassured that after the successful efforts of the Roosevelt administration to lift farm prices out of the mire that every effort will be made to continue a satisfactory program that will get results. The recent decision of the Supreme Court should indicate that the administration in power at the present time appreciates the fact that America is constantly changing and new progressive legislation must be advanced to cope with the problem. A new farm program will undoubtedly make its appearance during the present session, and if the experience of the past 3 years can be taken as a guide, we have every reason to believe that the farmers of the country will prosper under its influence.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH].

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Chairman, in the discussions of the act of the President in causing the Congress to assemble in joint session at the unusual hour of 9 p. m. to receive from him a communication it has been repeatedly stated that similar action was taken by President Woodrow Wilson when Congress was called in extra session to receive his message demanding a declaration of war against Germany. Nothing could be further from the fact. Instead of himself making the physical arrangements for a joint session at a time selected by himself and thereupon notifying Congress of his determination, President Woodrow Wilson waited patiently many hours until it suited the convenience of Congress to receive him.

For the purpose of keeping straight the record, I here relate what happened.

In the latter part of March, President Wilson issued a proclamation calling an extra session of the Sixty-fifth Congress, a newly elected Congress, for April 2, 1917. The proclamation reads:

Whereas public interests require that the Congress of the United States should be convened in extra session at 12 o'clock noon on the 2d day of April 1917 to receive a communication concerning grave matters of national policy, which should be taken immediately under consideration:
Now, therefore, * * *.

Both Houses met at noon on that day. The Senate, having organized at an earlier extra session in March, was ready to transact business at 12 minutes after 12 o'clock. The House of Representatives proceeded to organize as follows: First, there was the usual roll call by States. This was followed by a roll call which resulted in the election of Champ Clark, of Missouri, as Speaker. Next came a roll call electing South Trimble as Clerk of the House. Thus the House was organized for the transaction of business, and both Houses were ready at 1:30 o'clock to assemble in joint session to receive the President, who had indicated that he would deliver his communication orally.

It was a matter of general knowledge that the President was ready and waiting to proceed to the Capitol immediately upon notification by Congress.

Notwithstanding these facts, notwithstanding the grave importance of the subject matter under consideration, the House proceeded with the election of minor officials not essential to its organization, and further to elect the standing committees of the House. This required seven roll calls. Then the House by resolution informed the President that it had organized by the election of Champ Clark as Speaker and South Trimble as Clerk. It was then 7:47 p. m., and the President had been waiting with his message since noon. Thereupon the House recessed until 8:20 p. m. in order that the Members might get a bite to eat.

Upon resumption of the session at 8:20 p. m., the House passed the concurrent resolution that Congress would meet in joint session to receive the communication of the President, and at 8:37 p. m. the President arrived and delivered his communication recommending a declaration of war against Germany.

Notwithstanding the fact that he had been made to cool his heels at the doors of Congress for almost 8 hours, President Woodrow Wilson appreciated that it was the prerogative of the Congress to fix the time and the circumstances in which they would receive a communication from the President, and at no time then or thereafter uttered a word of complaint or criticism concerning the action of Congress in this respect.

This Seventy-fourth Congress is the only "9 o'clock Congress" in American history.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I have every faith in the belief that this farm situation will be unraveled during this session of Congress. I think we can go about it in a nonpartisan way and accomplish the results we need. The most encouraging feature of the whole thing is that the three strong farm organizations of the country—the Farmers Union, the Grange, and the Farm Bureau organization—are today in the vicinity of Congress with their representatives. They propose to get together on a united plan of action. When these large farm organizations get together on a plan for this Congress to put through, there ought to be no danger but what we can do it. Sometimes we are led astray by the argument that only one measure before Congress can be adopted to give relief; but I want to call attention to the fact that there are several things that can be done by this Congress to relieve the farm situation, the labor situation, and the general break-down in the buying power of the American people. It is not limited to the building up of any substitute for the A. A. A. It covers a large field.

The one thing that we can do more than anything else in talking about the relief of agriculture is to take into consideration the situation it is in today. We may start at 1920, when we had over 6,000,000 farms in the United States, and make our observations as to what the situation has been from then on. In that time 2,000,000 of the farms have been foreclosed and 2,000,000 more are on the way to foreclosure at this very moment. What can the Congress do to relieve this situation? One of the things they can do is to prevent the further loss of these farms by foreclosure. How can this be done?

The Federal land-bank system has broken down. The Federal land-bank system cannot be attributed to either party. It is a combination of both parties. The Federal land-bank system has quit lending. In the northwest district, from which I come, I am advised that they cannot make more loans. I asked them why. They stated, "Because the farmers' equity is gone."

In the State of Iowa the value of land today is only a fraction of what it was when the loans were made upon the land; consequently when you come to renew the mortgage you cannot get a commitment from a Federal land bank large enough to take care of the first mortgage.

Something else must be done to replace it. If we are to save the farms we must construct some other method of financing.

That is one of the reasons why I have been in favor of permitting this Congress to vote upon the Frazier-Lemke bill, which provides a method that will save the 2,000,000 farms now on the way to foreclosure. The only thing I am interested in is to see representative government in this country prevail. I cannot say that representative government does prevail when the Congress of the United States will not permit a vote upon an important measure such as the refinancing of farms.

Mr. Chairman, I leave this to both parties. It do not belong strictly to either party. I am nonpartisan. In the coming campaign how would you who come from the Democratic districts like to have your people say: "A Democratic House would not permit the American people a vote on a new refinancing bill for the American farmer"? How would you Republicans in New York like to have it said in the campaign that you would not use your influence to permit the American Congress to vote upon this subject? I leave it to both sides.

There are many things that this Congress can do, not only to relieve agriculture but everyone else. I am not an advocate of the theory that we must protect only the farmers. I am an advocate of the principle that if the farmers and the laborers of this country are protected and the buying power put into their hands, then the business structure of the whole Nation will be revived. You cannot do that if you are going to be prejudiced and settle only on one proposition that this Congress may consider. There are many things to consider, and it is up to us as Members of the Congress to consider all ways and means in a nonpartisan and patriotic way. [Applause.]

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. Is it not a fact that the Members of the House of Representatives are denying a vote upon the Frazier-Lemke farm-mortgage refinance bill, notwithstanding the fact that the Agriculture Committee of the House has favorably reported it to the House?

Mr. BURDICK. That is true. The gentleman makes a correct statement.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, under leave to revise and extend my remarks on the subject matter on which I addressed the House, I desire to say that there are some who think the A. A. A. was the only measure which could be of any benefit to agriculture. There are others who look forward with little hope.

As a matter of fact, the fight for the farmer has just begun. We can, if we will, do many things that will not only replace the A. A. A. but will bring so much greater benefits that the A. A. A. will be forgotten in 6 months.

First. The immediate thing to do is to pass the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill so that the 2,000,000 farms about to be foreclosed can be saved. The Federal Land Bank System has entirely broken down. The loaning business has stopped. The Federal land bank serving the Northwest at St. Paul admits that it cannot operate to refinance the rest of the farms. They say the loans are too big and they cannot make commitments that will take care of the first mortgages. At the time the present mortgages were negotiated the farm values were, in some instances, three times what that value is today under the appraisal system of the Federal land bank.

Farm land values by States showing percentage of value today as compared to the values in the pre-war period 1912–14.

The States are arranged in accordance with the lowest percentage of values. The first State named having the lowest percentage of value of farm lands as compared to the pre-war period:

	1935	Value in 1920
1. South Dakota ..... percent	54	181
2. Missouri ..... do	58	167
3. Indiana ..... do	61	161
4. Illinois ..... do	66	160
5. Ohio ..... do	66	159
6. Iowa ..... do	67	213
7. North Dakota ..... do	67	145
8. Nebraska ..... do	72	179
9. Georgia ..... do	72	217
10. Kansas ..... do	73	151
11. South Carolina ..... do	76	230
12. West Virginia ..... do	78	154
13. Pennsylvania ..... do	79	140
14. Wisconsin ..... do	82	171
15. Delaware ..... do	82	139
16. New York ..... do	82	133
17. Minnesota ..... do	83	213
18. Michigan ..... do	83	154

From the above table it should be apparent to anyone that when a debt was contracted on a farm in 1920 or 1925—when the amount of farm mortgages reached the peak point—those farms were valued at 170 percent, average, of the pre-war period values. Today we are trying to make loans on the same farms, using a value of 70 percent of the pre-war values.

A farm valued in pre-war period at $5,000 had a value of $8,500 when the loan was contracted. When we come now to make a new loan to refinance the old, we discover that the value of the same farm is fixed at $3,500. On a valuation of $8,500, 1920–25, a loan was made for 50 percent of the value, or $4,250. The loan is past due, and we try to refinance it through the Federal land bank. The appraisal shows a value of only $3,500, or actually $1,000 less than the face of the loan. On this new value we can make a loan—if we are lucky—of 75 percent of the value, or $2,625. This new loan lacks just $1,625 of being enough to pay the old principal. Usually there is a large amount of unpaid taxes and accumulated interest to be added to the principal. Result, the loan is turned down.

This same matter may be further illustrated by showing the drop in farm values from 1919 to the present time. For that purpose I submit the following table:

1919	$79,000,000,000
1920	66,316,000,000
1929	58,000,000,000
1930	47,880,000,000
1932	37,027,000,000
1933	30,151,000,000
1934	31,655,000,000

The Frazier-Lemke bill will permit a farmer to carry $6,000 as easily as he can $3,000 under the present plan.

Second. We can adopt the Massingale bill, providing for a cost-of-production plan. Every country in Europe has been operating under this system since 1929. We do not have to limit production or destroy property under this plan. The so-called surplus will be eliminated if the farmer knows he is growing this extra amount at a loss. The extra amount can go into world trade and compete with any country if only the farmer gets cost of production for that portion of his crop consumed at home. That is what Poland is doing with its rye. The importation of this Polish surplus destroyed our domestic market.

Third. We can put more money in circulation controlled by the Government and take off the unconscionable premium which money commands today. Those who say there is a strong following in Congress today hell-bent on inflation and the destruction of the value of the dollar, have no basis whatever for that statement. We do not desire to cheapen the dollar, but we do intend, if possible, to take off the extraordinary premium which the dollar commands today, with the corresponding result of the destruction of the price of farm commodities and the price paid to labor. The value of a dollar ought to be as good for one class as the other. We never hear these calamity howlers indicate that the farmer is operating, or trying to operate, with a depreciated dollar. That is why he cannot pay his mortgage. His dollar measured in his products is only 69 cents. What we want to do is to take off the premium on the dollar which it has in the hands of the holders of money, and turn that premium back to the value of agricultural products when these products are exchanged for the dollar. Just a square deal—nothing more, nothing less.

It is now a well-known principle of our financial economics that the amount of circulation, including demand deposits, is the measure of our national income. Multiply the amount of circulation, including demand deposits, by three and you have the national income.

Our circulation today is approximately—

Cash	$5,683,128,967
Demand deposits	11,200,000,000
Total	16,883,128,967

If we are to restore our normal national income, we shall have to increase the circulation to double what it is.

I submit the following tables (prepared by myself from data before the Agricultural Committee of the House and now available in a printed report), showing the fall in our national income since the year 1929, and also indicating the farmers' share of that income:

1929: $91,988,000,000; agriculture's share, $8,254,000,000; farmers' share, 9 percent plus.

1930: $70,300,000,000; agriculture's share, $6,955,000,000; farmers' share, 9 percent plus.

1932: $39,400,000,000; agriculture's share, $3,582,000,000; farmers' share, 9 percent plus.

1934: $47,500,000,000; agriculture's share, $5,287,000,000; farmers' share, 11 percent.

I now invite those who are "locoed" because we want to reestablish the lost circulation, to examine the figures on circulation, including demand deposits for the years above mentioned, and determine for themselves, once and for all, that the amount of our circulation does measure the national income.

There seem to be two elementary principles about money: First, there must be a sufficient amount in circulation to do the business of the Nation; second, that money must circulate. Even the circulation we have today, as small as it is, is not circulating. Look at almost any bank statement and you will see nothing conspicuous except "Reserves in cash and in correspondent banks." It is not circulating.

Fourth. We can put into effect an adequate old-age-pension act that will accomplish three outstanding things: (1) We can take care of the aged of the country and perform a duty on the part of this Government that has been too long delayed; (2) money in the hands of the aged to spend will take the place of relief. The aged will then become the relief administrators and replace the imported and unsympathetic administrators who are dealing out relief today. Poor farms, homes for the aged, community chest donations, and donations for charity which we all contribute to daily, overflowing insane asylums, penitentiaries, and houses of reformation, can, to a large degree, be eliminated, and the taxpayers relieved from a burden which they are now unable to carry; (3) the money will be forced into circulation by the necessity of monthly expenditures.

We cannot solve the unemployment problem by useless work programs. Worthless work, like the employment of able-bodied men to shoot jackrabbits, is not business; the building of scenic highways by pick, shovel, and wheelbarrow does not solve the unemployment situation. Work that is not beneficial to society and performed according to the standard of the times is wholly useless and will have to be paid by the people.

Fifth. The Government can cancel feed and seed loans by crediting up the loans and charging the Army and Navy appropriations. To maintain farms is a national necessity and the strongest national defense that this or any other country can have. Where would we be, in time of a war against this country, if our food supply should not be maintained? What good is an army without food? The World War should be a lesson. Germany had the best-trained, the best-equipped army of all nations engaged in that war. But Germany asked for a cessation of hostilities and sued for peace. What for? The only reason in the world was that there was no food in Germany. The farms were abandoned by the men who went to war, the livestock on the farms was eaten by the army, the farmers could not produce.

There are those who think my resolution, now pending before Congress, to cancel these loans for seed and feed, which the farmers cannot pay, is fantastic and not based on sound reasoning; but I submit that in the light of history this is what we should do, instead of spending more money to train men in the art of war.

Yes; there are many things that this Congress can do, and it should stay in session until next January, if necessary, to do the things that need to be done. If representative government were permitted in the Congress, we would accomplish that which is urgently necessary. Congress has no right to stifle legislation and not permit the Members of Congress to vote on any important legislation. The main reason why we have failed in a farm program is because representative government at Washington has failed. Some day the people will clean out this Congress, lock, stock, and barrel, and set up rules that will permit representative government to function. There is no use blaming the Supreme Court for their decision when the rules under which this Congress operates are worse than any decision ever handed down by the Supreme Court. This Congress in complaining of the Supreme Court should remember the fundamental rules of equity: First, he who comes into a court of equity must come with clean hands; second, he who seeks equity must be willing to do equity. Does the Congress stand before the people today with clean hands? Is this Congress willing to do equity?

The Congress should take an invoice of itself, and not blame anyone for anything until it first puts its own house in order.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERGUSON].

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two letters from farmers and a resolution which I have introduced.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I am indeed happy to have a chance to address the Members on the same day another farmer has taken up the cause of the agricultural West. I can offer testimony that my condition as an active farmer has been improved by the New Deal legislation. A year ago last fall I took a cow buyer out to show him my calves and I was offered $12.50 a head. I did not have to sell them at that time so I evaded that terrible price. This fall calves from the same herd of cows, and from the same pasture, brought $35 a head; yet the same day I sold my calves one of the old, reactionary Republican judges, now sitting on the bench, gave a long tirade on the fact that the farmers had not been benefited by the New Deal. Naturally he made little impression on myself or the other forced listeners who happened to be in the barber shop at the time.

We of the West were astounded that the only program that ever benefited the farmer had been thrown out the window by the Supreme Court. It seemed to us that the props had been knocked out from under us. In my humble opinion no decision that will cause any greater repercussion will ever be handed down by the Supreme Court. To me this decision of the Supreme Court means that a line, just as definite as the old Mason and Dixon's line, has been drawn between the agricultural West and the industrial East. I hope that Members of this Congress who represent the industrial East will realize this situation.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers of the country are not going to be fooled into accepting vague promises. They were shown the promised land under the platform adopted by the Republican Party for three successive administrations. Two Republican Presidents vetoed the farm legislation that was passed by this Congress. Herbert Hoover gave them the ill-begotten Farm Board. So they are not going to be lulled to sleep by political promises. We have to offer that group of American citizenship something definite, and when I say "something definite" I mean that the contracts that have been made, the contracts that have been fulfilled by the farmers, are going to have to be paid. This Congress is going to have to appropriate the money to pay the wheat farmers who have fulfilled their contracts and reduced their acreage the sum of money that the Government has promised to pay them. Personally, I think that the first act of this Congress following the Supreme Court decision should have been the reenactment of the processing tax. If we take the attitude that the Supreme Court decision closed this avenue of revenue, we might just as well say that this source of taxation is forever barred because the Supreme Court said the purpose to which the money was put did not meet with their approval.

Since we know that the old contracts have to be met and that some new contracts will have to be made, and until some new plan is devised to take care of the American farmer we might as well reenact these processing taxes.

I also think if there is any way under the sun that the $185,000,000 impounded by the order of the Court could be placed into the Treasury of the United States, it should be done. The idea of a processor, who took at least half the tax on the product off the producer to take care of the tax, and in addition to this passed it on in full to the consumer, by an order of the Court being returned the $185,000,000 that has been taken out of the pockets of the American people does not fit into the picture as the farmer today sees his rights.

My father is 72 years old and since his youth has been engaged in farming and ranching. He is still very active in business, and I take a great deal of pride in his judgment. Here is a letter he wrote me on this subject:

WELLINGTON, KANS., January 8, 1936.

PHIL FERGUSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SON: Since the A. A. A. has been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, leaving a lot of money in the hands of the various parties who collected enormous sums for processing tax, which money was collected from the producer and the cost passed on to the consumer, it is plain to be seen that the parties holding this money have no right to one cent of it.

There should be a plan devised whereby the Government can take this over to use in paying the Government's obligations on its contracts with the farmer, cotton man, and others. If no other way can be devised, it seems to me they could pass a law taking this money over on the ground of ill-gotten gains.

In other words, there must be some way for the Government to get this money to meet its promised obligations to the farmer, the cotton man, and others. I wish you would look into this and let me hear from you.

Yours,

W. M. FERGUSON.

This Congress is made up of lawyers. A vast majority of the Members here are members of the bar. As a farmer, I represent a distinct minority, but I think if this body were made up of farmers and businessmen, laymen, so to speak, it would not consent to having the only law that ever benefited the great agricultural West kicked out without making a protest, and without making an effort to reinstate us in our rights. Making a fight for a permanent plan that will aid agriculture would be one of their first moves.

The recommendation on agricultural legislation submitted by the Committee of Thirteen has a great deal of merit. No one is more aware of the danger this country faces from soil destruction than I. But I am afraid that the Supreme Court decision makes any plan that requires a contract, or even voluntary action on the part of the farmer, unconstitutional.

With this in view I have introduced a proposed constitutional amendment. I think we can appropriate money to pay the contracts. I think we may be able to sustain the price of agricultural products by some artificial method until we can change the Constitution, but to get at the real heart of the trouble I think the Constitution will have to be amended.

When we hear about polls and about what the people are thinking, I do not want this body to be misguided. I hold in my hand a letter addressed to me by an assembly of 245 farmers in one of my counties. They put various propositions up to this group of farmers. Every one of this group who voted, 241 out of the 245 that were present, voted to memorialize me here in Congress to change the Constitution so as to make legislation similar to the A. A. A. constitutional. I am including the resolution in the RECORD.

BOISE CITY, OKLA., January 11, 1936.

To the Honorable Senators and Members of Congress of the United States of America, greetings:

We, the active farmers of Cimarron County, Okla., in lawful assembly at Boise City, Okla., this day and date, the 11th day of January, A. D. 1936, have passed the following resolutions by count of standing votes, a statement of the same which is made a part of this resolution, and we here present the same to you for your careful consideration and action:

Whereas in recent years since the close of the World War in 1918 modern machinery has enabled the farmer to materially increase production and has added many hundreds of thousands of acres of formerly uncultivated land to production, which has caused an excess in surplus of farm products over and above that which could be consumed in the United States or sold for export trade abroad; and

Whereas other nations have shared in this same development and have produced more of these products at home, which has lessened their purchases from the United States; and

Whereas, under these conditions, in this county wheat reached the extreme low price of 23 cents per bushel, corn as low as 27 cents per hundred pounds, hogs as low as $1.60 per hundred, and other farm products in proportion, which was far below the cost of production and placed the farming industry in chaotic conditions; and

Whereas Congress intended to overcome this serious condition in an agricultural adjustment program spoken of as the A. A. A.; and

Whereas the Supreme Court has ruled that this law is unconstitutional:

We the farmers of Cimarron County, Okla., here wish to express our unbiased opinions and unselfish desires in regard to legislation affecting the agricultural interests of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the honorable Senators and Members of Congress be urged to pass proper legislation providing funds to pay obligations on all outstanding Agricultural Adjustment contracts in which compliances have been made and are now unpaid.

Further be it

Resolved, That they pass legislation adjusting agricultural production within the range of abundance for home consumption of the United States plus a reasonable amount for export and plus a reasonable surplus for carry-over from year to year.

Present, 244; yes, 241; no, 0.

Whereas a citizen of the United States charged in any criminal action is presumed by the courts to be innocent until proven guilty; and

Whereas it takes a unanimous vote of all jurors sitting in said case to adjudge said defendant guilty; and

Whereas all laws in the United States are passed and placed upon the statute books by majority vote of the Senate and honorable Members of Congress and approved by the President; and

Whereas this legislative body is elected by popular vote of the citizens of the United States and presumed to be the best informed and best qualified to occupy such position: Therefore be it

Resolved, That when a law is properly passed and placed on the statute books of the United States that it be presumed that this law is right until proven to be unconstitutional, which should only be done by unanimous vote of all members of the Supreme Court.

Present, 244; yes, 241; no, 0.

Further be it

Resolved, That a three-fourths majority vote of the Senators and Members of Congress which has been approved by the President of the United States shall overrule any decision of the Supreme Court.

Present, 244; yes, 241; no, 0.

Further be it

Resolved, That they pass legislation to the extent that all collected processing taxes now held in escrow by the various courts shall be collected by the Federal Government and not be returned to the plaintiffs in the various suits.

Present, 244; yes, 241; no, 0.

We, the committee on resolutions, recommend the adoption as read, and recommend that a copy be sent to each one of the Senators and Members of Congress from Oklahoma; and to the Honorable MARVIN JONES, chairman of the Agricultural Committee; and to the Honorable Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture; and to the Honorable Chester C. Davis, Administrator of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

If you think the farmers are going to accept vague theories and beautiful promises in lieu of the first real equalization tax they ever had, you are very much mistaken. I have introduced this resolution; since we are so technical in our decisions in the courts, we can, I think, change the meaning of the Constitution by a slight technical change in punctuation.

At this point I want to insert the text of my House Joint Resolution 446:

House Joint Resolution 446

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. So much of section 8 of article I of the Constitution as reads as follows: 'The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;' is amended to read as follows: 'The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; and to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States;'.

"SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within 5 years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

Although I am not a lawyer, after studying the history of the Constitution I have come to the conclusion that by the mere changing of a comma to a semicolon and the insertion of the conjunction "and", Congress would have the power to enact A. A. A. and other legislation that would be held constitutional.

Let me read to you the section that I propose to change:

So much of section 8 of article I of the Constitution as reads as follows: "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

I propose to amend that as follows:

The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises;—

The comma is changed to a semicolon—and to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

[Applause.]

Thus, by the mere changing of a comma to a semicolon, and the insertion of the conjunction "and", Congress has these distinct powers: One, to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; two, to pay the debts; and three, to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. No longer does the phrase "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States" act as merely a limitation on the taxing problem. But with the punctuation suggested in my amendment, Congress has the power to lay taxes for whatever purpose it deems necessary. Also, as a separate and distinct power, Congress is empowered to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. It seems strange to me that Congress has proceeded over a period of years to legislate for the general welfare of the Nation by using expedient methods of circumventing the Constitution.

I hold in my hand five bills, important bills, passed by Congress since 1932. Only one of these even presumes to justify its existence on the general welfare of the Nation. First, let us look at the A. A. A. In the declaration policy, we find that the legal excuse, the legal justification for this legislation is based on the theory that the break-down of the agricultural industries "have burdened and obstructed the normal currents of commerce in such commodities." In order to try to make legislation that was absolutely essential to the welfare of that group—the American farmers—constitutional, or supposedly constitutional, the legislation was tacked onto the overworked commerce clause of the Constitution. One of the most glaring examples of this policy of trying to make the commerce clause something that we can hang any legislation on is the Wagner disputes bill. I do not want to be misunderstood. I was heartily in favor of this legislation, but I think the rights of American labor to bargain collectively contributes to the general welfare of the Nation and I do not think we should stand back at amending a Constitution that requires such social legislation to be attached to the commerce clause only, and in the light of the N. I. R. A. decision and the A. A. A. decision, we all know that this legislation when tested will be declared unconstitutional.

Let me read to this body the findings and policies of the Wagner disputes bill, to recall and refresh your memory on the legal gymnastics resorted to in this policy clause.

SECTION 1. The denial by employers of the right of employees to organize and the refusal by employers to accept the procedure of collective bargaining lead to strikes and other forms of industrial strife or unrest, which have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by (a) impairing the efficiency, safety, or operation of the instrumentalities of commerce; (b) occurring in the current of commerce; (c) materially affecting, restraining, or controlling the flow of raw materials or manufactured or processed goods from or into the channels of commerce, or the prices of such materials or goods in commerce; or (d) causing diminution of employment and wages in such volume as substantially to impair or disrupt the market for goods flowing from or into the channels of commerce.

Let us examine another bill passed at the last session, the so-called T. V. A. legislation that is up for review in the Supreme Court. In a statement of policy in this bill it attempts to prove that the principal aim of the legislation is to provide for flood control and to provide for national defense. Yet we all know that this is an attempt by the Government to create a yardstick by which we may determine just rates that the people should pay for electric power. It is not that the purpose of the bill is unworthy that I am calling this to your attention, but rather to illustrate the absurdity of being unable to pass legislation to promote the general welfare and recognize it as such.

I also hold in my hand a copy of the holding-company bill. For two pages we have the efforts of ingenious lawyers, who tie this bill on the commerce clause of the Constitution. Any Member of Congress who heard the debate on this legislation knows that the regulation of utilities holding companies was absolutely necessary to promote the general welfare. Here again we have legislation that undoubtedly will be declared unconstitutional when it is brought into the Court for review.

N. I. R. A. although in its declaration of policy, spoke of the fact that "a national emergency productive of widespread unemployment and disorganization of industry, which burdens interstate and foreign commerce", but this did not save it from being declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court.

The social-security bill admits that it is an attempt to provide for the general welfare, but under the narrow interpretation of the general-welfare clause as given by the Supreme Court in the A. A. A. decision, it, too, will be declared unconstitutional. Old-age pensions will be impossible after this decision.

So we must face the situation. I have reviewed six great measures passed by the Roosevelt administration. Two of them, the A. A. A. and the N. I. R. A., have already been declared unconstitutional; four of them, the social security, the holding-company bill, the T. V. A., and the Wagner disputes bill—as well as the Guffey coal bill, which should be included in this group—will, in the light of these decisions, also be declared unconstitutional. I for one cannot endorse spending another session in Congress trying to patch up legislation, trying by indirection and subterfuge to accomplish what the Supreme Court says under our present Constitution we are not able to do.

To go back to my resolution that proposes an amendment of the Constitution. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution, Patrick Henry and George Mason made very able arguments that would give great power to the general-welfare clause in section 8 of article 1. These men were champions of State rights and were afraid this clause gave too much power to the Federal Government. Although Story would make you believe that everyone understood the meaning of section 8 of article 1, he spends many pages defining this meaning. In proving the point, or rather making clear his point, that the power of taxation only is given by the clause and it is limited to objects of national character, by "to pay the debts and provide for the defense and the general welfare", and in order to make his position absolutely clear that the general-welfare portion is merely a qualification of the first part of section 8 of article 1, he says that it should be read, "The Congress should have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises 'in order' to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States."

I do not think historically it would be possible to make a case against Story's interpretation.

However, there is some justification for the view that the framers of the Constitution meant the Congress to have the power to legislate for the general welfare. According to Elliot's Debates, volume 1, page 336, in the revised draft of the Constitution, reported September 12, 1787, by the committee of revision, section 8 of article I reads:

SEC. 8. The Congress may by joint ballot appoint a treasurer; they shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises: To pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

You will note that the word "excises" is followed by a colon, which distinctly breaks the thought and gives the Congress power to legislate for the general welfare. However, on September 15—Elliot's Debates, volume 1, page 342—the following amendment was adopted:

Add at the end of the first clause of the eighth section, first article, "but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States."

It is plain to see that when this uniformity limitation was placed on the taxing power, the punctuation was revised to make the power "to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and the general welfare" not a separate power, as it was when it followed a semicolon after "excises", but as Justice Story interpreted it, with its present punctuation the clause is merely a limiting factor to the taxing power.

I do not pretend my resolution is clarifying the Constitution. I believe, and fully intend, that the adoption of my resolution would greatly increase the powers of Congress by giving them the power to tax with only the limitations of uniformity and also a new power to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States.

It will probably seem strange to those who have so long opposed any change in the Constitution that a small change of punctuation, the mere changing of a comma to a semicolon, and the insertion of the conjunction "and", would so greatly increase the powers of Congress; but I have confidence enough in this body. I think the history of our Government has shown that the power would be used wisely and well. I want to predict that whether this resolution is passed by this Congress or not—and I believe it should be—a general-welfare clause will be submitted to the States this year or at some time in the future. Congress must have the power to provide for the common defense and the general welfare of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAIN].

Mr. MAIN. Mr. Chairman, regardless of how it may appear in the course of my remarks, I want you to know that there has been no collusion between the Democratic Representative, my friend the gentleman from Oklahoma, who just preceded me, and myself.

My accession to membership in this body has come about through a sequence of events somewhat unusual and wholly unanticipated a few short months ago. It is my hope that my district will not suffer unduly because of the frequent and sudden changes in its representation in this honorable body. First and foremost I desire to acquire a personal acquaintance with the membership of this House, among the majority members as well as among the representatives on the minority side. Perhaps taking this opportunity of saying a few words upon the floor of the House soon after my appearance as a Member will serve in a small way to promote that acquaintance among you, which I crave, in order that I may sooner overcome some of the disadvantages that will inevitably accrue to my district because of the untimely passing of my friend and predecessor, the Honorable Henry M. Kimball, of Kalamazoo, and through the equally untimely and unfortunate passing of my good friend and fellow townsman, the Honorable Joseph L. Hooper, of Battle Creek.

Naturally I am pleased to be here. But in addition to the sobering references already expressed, I am somewhat further depressed at the reflection that on the very day I took the oath of office "to support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic", a very distinguished gentleman, who had likewise taken an oath of office of equal or more serious import, saw fit to interpret the functions of his office in a manner tending, although perhaps not calculated, to demean and belittle the high office of which he is the present incumbent.

One who comes to Washington with convictions at variance with the policies of the President first finds himself inclined to sympathy and pity for a man who seems to have been caught in a maze of labyrinthian confusions and contradictions. But when one recalls that the platform was accepted, and that policies and personnel were selected by the President himself; and after one sees that same President, through the connivance of his campaign manager and the supine acquiescence of the majority in this House, seize upon the occasion for the message of a statesman and distort it into one for partisan political purposes, under such circumstances I say one is promptly disillusioned as to any political tolerance or catholicity in the spirit of the President. And the predisposition to sympathy and concern for the traditionally burdened occupant of the White House is promptly and completely dissipated. And one finds himself in a mood to go forth in this House or out on the hustings and discuss the man Franklin D. Roosevelt not as the President of the United States but as the individual who is seeking the election to the Presidency as the candidate of the Democratic Party.

Why is it that the Democratic Party, with so much of its numerical quantity—and, I may say, a good share of its mental and spiritual quality—in the great Southland—why is it that so frequently we find the party of the present majority going to the North Atlantic seaboard for its candidate? Talk about Pyrrhic victories for Republicans! It seems to me that the great party of Jefferson and Jackson has had nothing but Pyrrhic victories in recent decades; and, like Pyrrhus of ancient days, the majority may well say with him, "Another victory like that and we will be undone." But I would be untrue to myself and to my own party if I should lead you to believe that my whole concern at this time is the welfare of the Democratic Party. For my part I am interested, first, in the "state of the Union"; and my responsibility is to see what I, as a member of the Republican Party, can do at this time to protect, preserve, and promote the general welfare of the Nation through the activities of this Congress.

Now, may I say that I was charmed by the President's personality. But it was apparent from the message of January 3 that the President is strangely lacking in, or unwilling to express, ideas of statecraft. When he undertook to perform a constitutional duty and address the Congress upon the "state of the Union", he could only resort to the ancient device of shouting "Wolf! Wolf!" in order to once again arouse the populace to his call. But the folk tale of old has its modern counterpart; and even the President of the United States cannot deceive the people time without number and still expect the people to come running to drive away a wolf whenever he chooses to hurl epithets at imaginary raiders of the fold.

He shouted "Wolf! Wolf!" when he sounded the alarm against the money changers. But banks were closed and stockholders and depositors were crucified, while the bogey of the fiendish banker was being paraded into view for torture by the Democratic gladiators.

When the Supreme Court handed down its unanimous decision refusing to referee proceedings over a chicken coop in New Jersey, the President shouted "Wolf! Wolf!" and said that we were returning to the horse-and-buggy days.

But there have been more automobiles made and sold since that peevish comment by the President than during any comparable period since A. F. D. R.—the advent of Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

Again the President shouted the alarm. But that time he stuttered somewhat, and he could only say, "A-A-A wolf!" While the record does not disclose that the wolf got any of the lambs of the flock, we do know that the President actually condoned the destruction of little pigs and other livestock in the pasture. The majority in the Seventy-third Congress came running to his call. But they didn't drive away the wolf. They simply aided and abetted the destruction, in the doing of which the hungry wolf of an earlier day was considered a public enemy.

The drought of 1934 threatened the prestige of the President in that presumptuous and unnatural undertaking, but the credit has been given to Tugwell and Wallace.

And now comes the alarm that the wolf is upon us again; that a greedy and unscrupulous gang of profiteers are prowling around the sheepfold. But the patience of the people of the villages in the Third Congressional District of Michigan—as well as in the cities and on the farms—has been exhausted. They are more fearful of the unfaithful tender of the flock within the pasture than of the busy wolf that exists only in the imagination of the prankster who has been charged with the duty of tending the flock.

The misfeasance—and I may add the malfeasance—in the administration of W. P. A. and P. W. A. projects as partisan enterprises for political profit has reacted against the administration and its sponsors. When the President demanded and received sole responsibility for the allocation and expenditure of the most stupendous peacetime appropriation ever authorized by the Congress of the United States he definitely and deliberately assumed the hazards as well as the political advantage that accrue from such vast discretionary power.

I am advised by the W. P. A. workers in my district that they have not received their pay for nearly 4 weeks. These same workers were persuaded, and attempts were made to coerce them, into voting for my Democratic opponent in the campaign preceding the election held December 17, 1935. No wonder that the attempts at coercion failed to coerce; they knew full well that their week's pay would not take care of the family needs. And now they have had insult added to injury by having their pay delayed. No wonder they were not impressed with the pointed remarks of their bosses, timekeepers, and political overlords that they must vote Democratic if they wanted to keep their jobs. Thank the Lord we still have the secret-ballot booth in the Third Congressional District of Michigan.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAIN. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. While the Supreme Court invalidated the A. A. A. and the N. R. A., does not the gentleman think that it did a tremendous amount of good?

Mr. MAIN. No; in view of the drought in 1934 I do not think you could claim the benefits of that any more than you can claim that Joseph of old was made a statesman when, by statute, he took care of all the people in the lean years of scriptural record.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. The President made an effort, and is it not a fact that the labor organization——

Mr. MAIN. Yes; the President made an effort, as he said, in the spirit of trial and error. I submit that the people have had the trial and the Supreme Court has been charged with the error. [Laughter.]

Perhaps labor was disappointed with the N. R. A. decision, but if the gentlemen will bear with me, I hope to suggest procedure which will put labor upon a safe legal basis for its program.

In an equal degree, it will be no wonder if the people fail to respond to the latest cry of "Wolf! Wolf!" in the harangue invoking suspicion of class against class. We have had enough of responding to false alarms. The time is fast approaching when the cry of the "Big Bad Wolf" will be recognized as only the bray of the Democratic donkey.

One business leader, promptly disciplined by his own organization, proposed to "gang up on the President." This discredited spokesman seems to have exorcised the President into a spirit of sheer abandon as to the real state of the Union. Once again he shouts "Wolf! Wolf!", while availing himself of the courtesy of this House as a soundingboard to cause his partisan remarks to echo in the far corners of the Nation.

The President in his speech on the "State of Prospects of the Democratic Party", presented just two ideas that were appropriate to the time and place of their utterance: And these two were his "good neighbor" remarks about the western continent, and the other was his expression of sentiments relative to proposed neutrality measures. His attempt to talk over the heads of the rulers of European nations into the ears of their subjects was presumptuous and pregnant with international resentments and reactions. This effort is akin to the fomenting influences of the Soviet Republic in this country which are so insidious and so dangerous to our institutions and principles of government.

The President is to be commended for his stand on neutrality, but, in harmony with that good old phrase from the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, let us have a "government of laws, not of men." If this neutrality measure is right, safe, and sound, let it be mandatory and not discretionary in the decision of one man, whether he comes from a patrician home on the banks of the Hudson, the plains of Texas, the west coast, or the North Central States.

Mr. Chairman, when you have given the President the credit for these two features of his message you have credited him with all that he said on "the state of the Union." The rest of his speech must be considered under the heading of the "state of the prospects of Herbert Hoover."

But on Monday, January 6, a more significant development transpired, compared to which the surrender of the President to partisan, rabble-rousing tactics on a time-honored occasion, intended for the enlightenment of the Nation, is negligible. The Supreme Court has determined that the nightmare delusions of the "brain trusters" will not stand the test of daylight government.

The A. A. A. legislation was a perversion of natural law in its inception, and now its fallacy as a legal concept has been established.

And now, Mr. Chairman, this is the point to which I rise: What about this much-talked-of but greatly neglected theme, "the state of the Union"? Are the leaders of the majority in this House again waiting for the product of the "brain trust" to show us the way to meet the problems of agriculture and the many vital problems that seem to have been thrown back into the lap of Congress by the epoch-making decision of the Supreme Court?

Not by one sentence or syllable do I cast discredit or criticism upon the decision of the Court; but I do intimate that the majority members in the preceding session of Congress were derelict in their duty in simply rubber-stamping the proposals of the "hot-dog boys" and the "meant-well" planners. And I do say that the President was derelict in his duty when he asked the Congress to enact the Guffey coal bill regardless of reasonable doubts as to its constitutionality. I do say that we are all derelict in our duty if, now that we are face to face with the obvious fact that no great forward step in social legislation can be taken without a constitutional amendment—I say we are all derelict if we do not proceed at once to prepare the way for the sovereign people to say whether they want those changes written into our fundamental law. Many of the present Members of this House are of the opinion that progress was made when the eighteenth amendment was repealed. That was done with dispatch and decisiveness when it appeared the time had come for that action.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Members on the majority side of this House believe that we must have Federal regulation of such matters as agriculture, child labor, sweat shops, old-age pensions, disparity of wages between North and South, industrial relations, and human relief, why do they tolerate these palliative measures that are being proposed by the "brain trust", with practically all of the inherent defects which have been outlawed in the Hoosac Mills decision? (See Raymond Moley.)

Mr. Chairman, I know that there are men and women on the majority side of this House who have a deep understanding of our concept of constitutional government. I know that you have on the majority side of this House jurists and scholars trained and steeped in our theory of government, with its dual aspects of sovereignty and its ideals for the protection of the private citizen in every honorable calling in every section of our country. I challenge you jurists and scholars, with the prestige and power of the majority at your disposal, to do that which will squarely meet and fairly dispose of the delicate and decisive duties that confront us. Let us, I say, have a government of laws, and not of men, whether those laws are to be administered by an Executive of Democratic or Republican choice.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

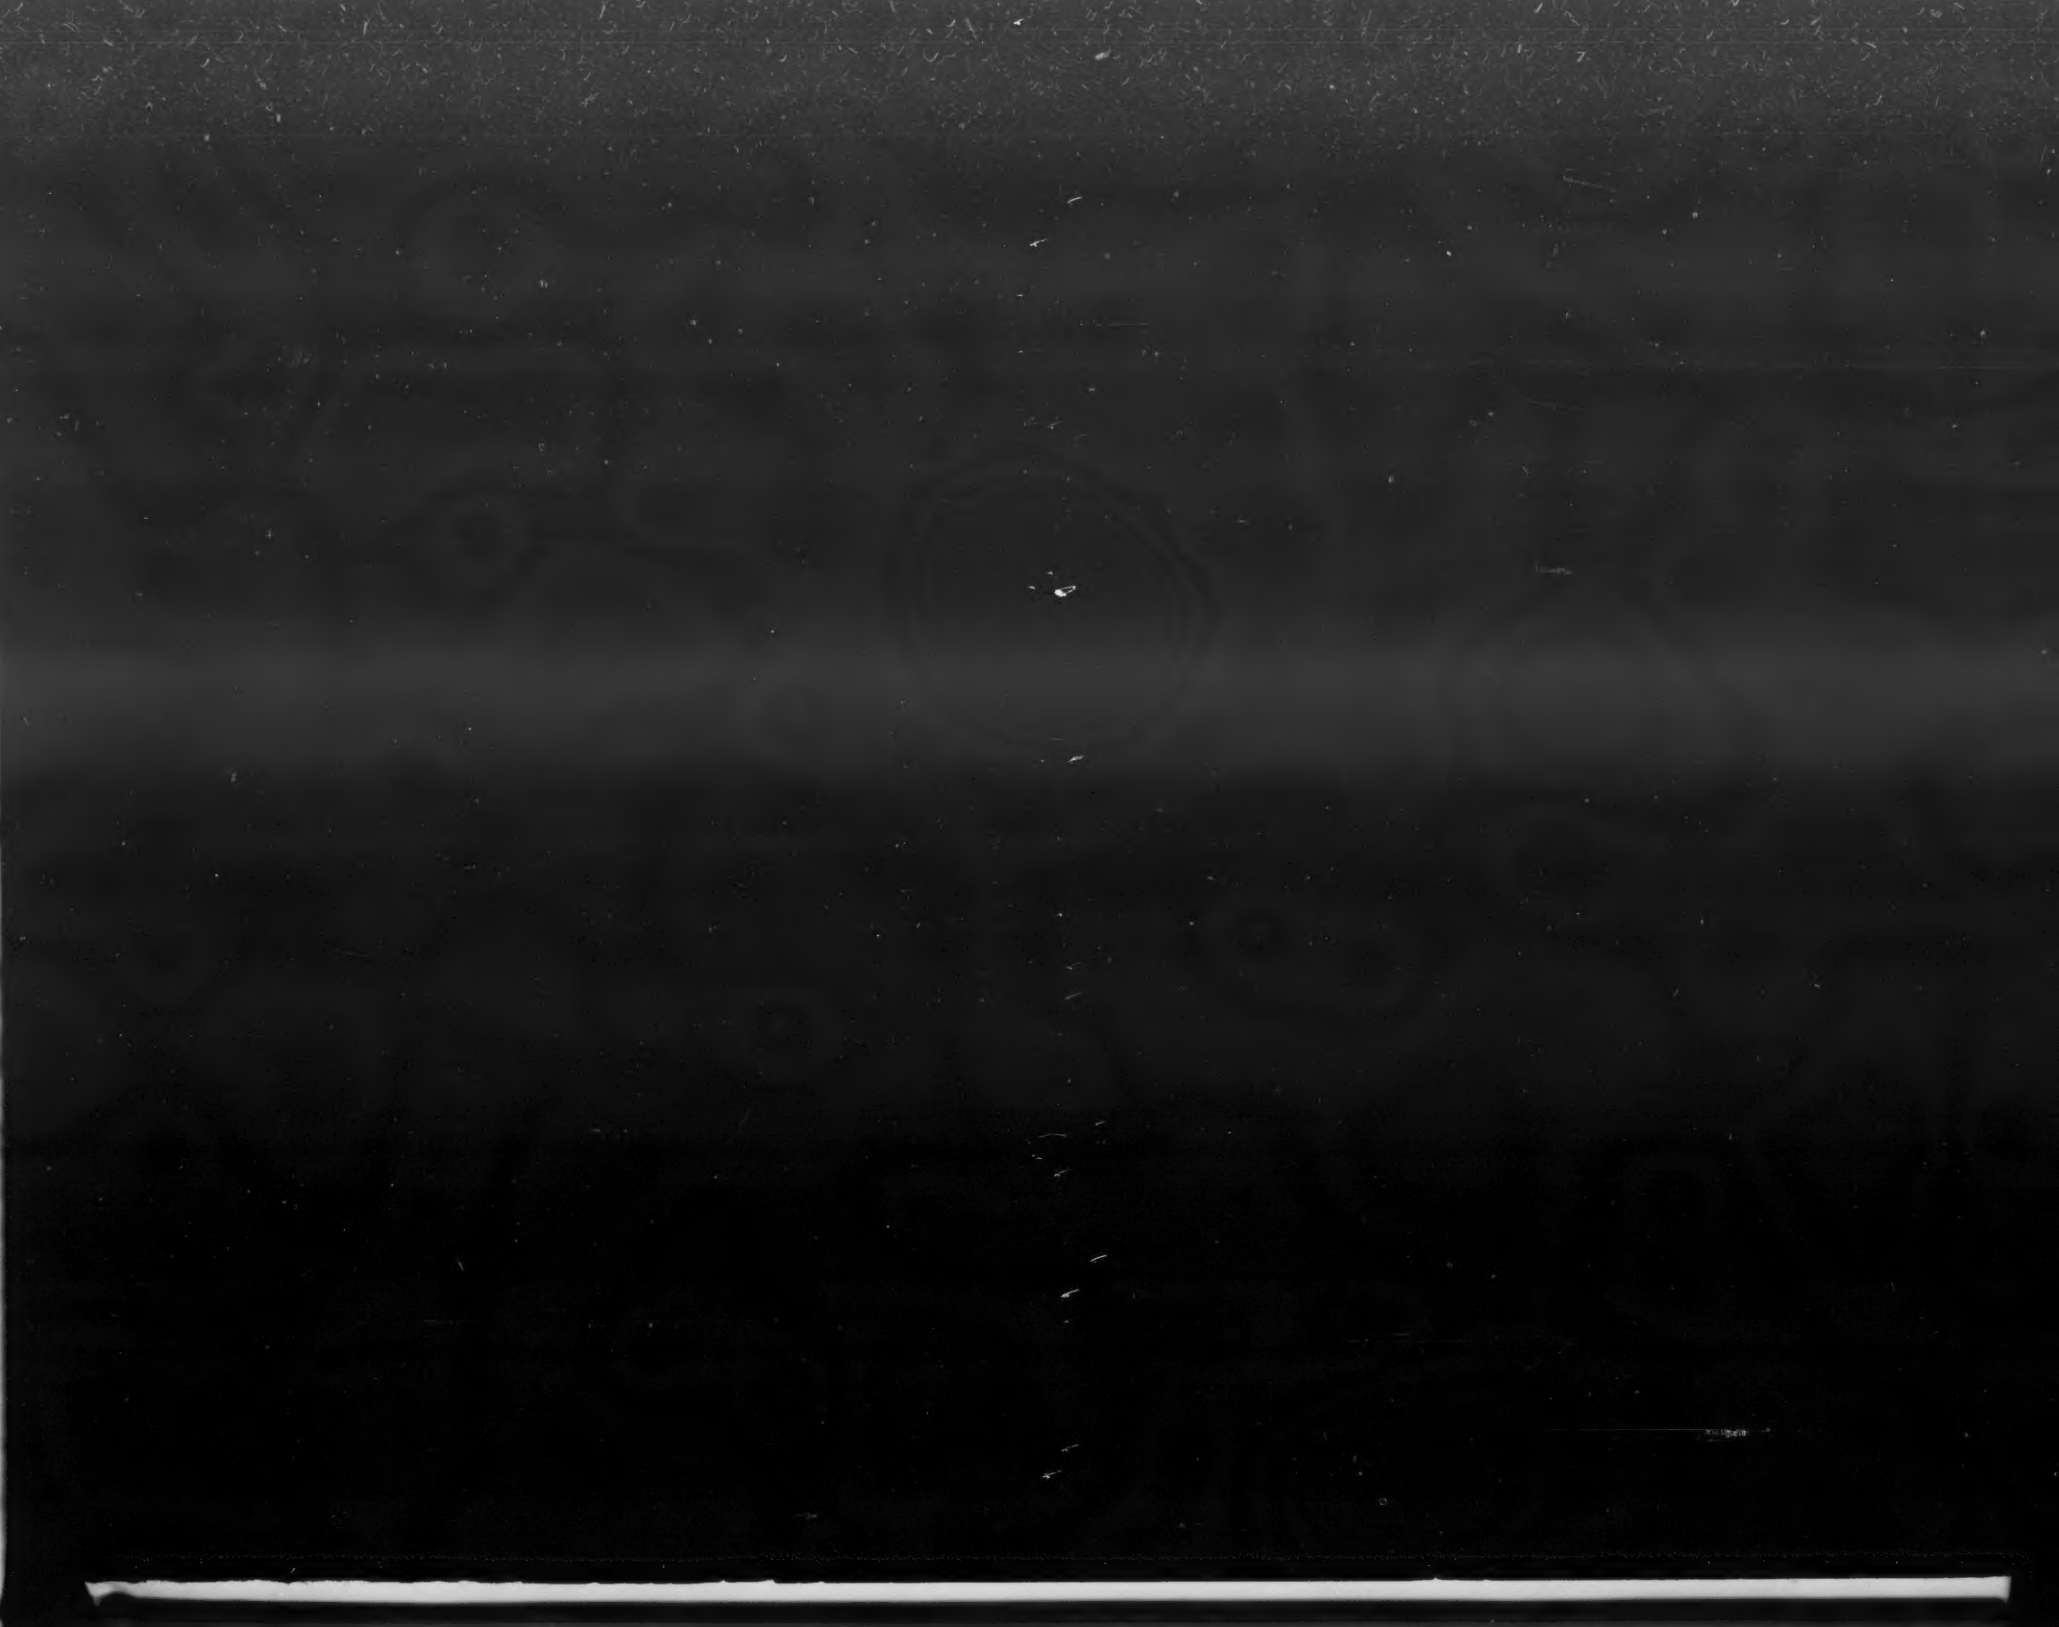
Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to make a few remarks on the Budget system and the deficit situation and on the situation with reference to the national debt.

What I have to say is rather minute, and it is something I want to be very particular about, and therefore I will be unable to yield to anyone while I am delivering the remarks.

The President has submitted a Budget calling for $5,649,000,000 for expenditures for the regular departments. To this must be added, for certain, at the present time $200,000,000 to pay the impounded A. A. A. processing taxes; also $236,000,000, which is the estimated cost of paying those who had A. A. A. contracts where there has been partial performance. There can be no repudiation of contracts, in the opinion of the Republican Party, regardless of whether or not, as in this case, the authority to make the contracts was invalid. There must also be added, on the theory that the Government has not carried the bonus as a debt liability, $2,500,000,000 for the bonus; a total of $8,585,000,000.

There must be subtracted from the President's estimates of revenue $547,000,000 on account of processing taxes. Whether his other estimates as to income taxes and other items of revenue will pan out no one knows.

If an agricultural bill is adopted which is not a menace to recovery and agriculture, as the A. A. A. was, probably the miscellaneous taxes will increase. If some of the damage that has been done to American agriculture and American business by the operations of the so-called recovery measures can be headed off, there will undoubtedly be an increase in miscellaneous taxes. But, frankly, I do not see how the total of the Government's income can exceed $4,500,000,000, even if the provisions of the Social Security Act survive.



This, in itself, before we tackle the relief problem, is going to give a deficit of $4,085,000,000 in the regular operating expenses, from which must be deducted the amount of estimated expenditures under the A. A. A. of $619,000,000, leaving a deficit on regular operating expenses of the Government of $3,466,000,000.

With reference to the regular operating expenses of the Government, I am going to discuss in brief detail the different Budget estimates that have come up here.

The estimates for the legislative appropriation bill run this year practically $22,000,000, a decrease because of less construction of approximately $500,000. With the exception of building items, an increase is shown of approximately $500,000, the smallest proportionate increase of any Budget estimate.

The independent offices appropriation bill, which is now under consideration by the House, shows total estimates of $1,221,598,000 for regular activities, as against $846,033,000 appropriations in 1936, an increase of $375,565,000. Of this, $47,645,000 is for the Railroad Retirement Board. There is an increase for the Interstate Commerce Commission of $1,500,000. There is an increase for the General Accounting Office of $400,000. There is an increase of $1,400,000 for the Federal Power Commission. The Veterans' Administration has an increase of $95,000,000. There is an increase of $246,000,000 for emergency conservation work, which probably will run in a deficiency bill later on. The Civil Service Commission has an increase of $6,000,000, being entirely on account of the civil-service retirement fund. The Securities Exchange Commission has an increase of $2,000,000.

Every single bureau and commission has shown a very substantial increase in appropriations, with the possible exception of the National Advisory Committee on Aeronautics.

Operating expenses have everywhere run up; run up without regard to what would seem to be proper economy in the operation of the Government. Many of these items are for new activities, under the cloak of which I presume the administration hopes to get by without much change in the appropriations.

In the Agricultural Department, exclusive of the A. A. A. estimates, we have for the Department for 1937, $196,338,600. In 1936 the appropriations were $147,140,247, showing an increase in proposed expenditures of $49,198,000. The larger increases are, for the Forest Service, $5,800,000; roads, $9,000,000; soil conservation, $26,736,000.

Practically every item shows a very large increase in personnel and activities indicating again in this Department absolutely no regard for economy in government.

For the Commerce Department the estimate actually shows a decrease in the total from $34,702,400 to $34,264,175. That is, however, brought about only by elimination of a census operation, which is a nonrecurring item of $1,534,000. The other bureaus in the Commerce Department show a very large increase in personnel and operation, the ordinary items of increase running to a total of $1,105,000.

The Interior Department last year called for $89,061,000. This year the Budget estimates call for one of the largest proposed increases of any department, the estimated increase being $71,540,000. For the Bureau of Reclamation, designed to throw more land open to cultivation, $61,831,000 is estimated. Of all the ridiculous increases in estimates of appropriations for the waste of the people's money, this Department leads off. Every item in the Department, with the exception of the Geological Survey and the petroleum-control item, shows a very large increase in personnel and a tremendous development of expenditures for the people to meet. It is an indication of the masterful efficiency of the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Ickes, in obtaining appropriations for things that the Government does not need.

The Department of Justice shows an increase from $35,121,000 to $43,795,000, or $8,673,000. A very large portion of this is used up in the appropriation for maintenance of additional prisoners, indicating the tremendous growth of crime which has been going on.

The Labor Department shows an increase from $15,688,000 to $24,463,000, or $8,775,000. Practically every single item shows an increase. The largest item of increase is the social security development of the Children's Bureau, $8,470,000.

The Navy Department shows an increase from $481,731,000 to $549,591,000, or $67,859,000. The big items of increase are for building of ships, $55,595,000, and for additional cost of feeding and caring for and paying the additional personnel in the Navy.

The State Department shows an increase from $15,938,000 to $19,128,000, or $3,190,000. The big item of increase is an item labeled "Foreign intercourse." The International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico, absorbing $3,760,000 of that increase, and the money, as I understand it, is to be used for the building of a road in the Republic of Mexico at the expense of the Government of the United States. Contingent expenses in the Foreign Service show an increase of $868,000.

The Treasury Department shows an increase of $69,385,000, the appropriation increasing from $1,597,397,000 to $1,666,783,000. In the Treasury Department a very large increase is shown for most of the operating forces. The Coast Guard and the Customs Service account for $7,000,000 of the increase, the Public Health Service for $10,000,000, and the Public Debt Service $91,000,000. Of the decrease estimated of $7,000,000 on account of public buildings will appear later, as I understand it, in the deficiency estimate, a saving in tax refunds of $25,000,000 will be offset in the statement that I have made above for refund of processing taxes, $200,000,000.

For the War Department an increase is shown from $422,000,000 to $571,000,000, or approximately $149,000,000. The largest items of the increase are the Air Corps, about $17,000,000; the National Guard Bureau, $2,400,000; rivers and harbors, $124,238,000, an increase for the river and harbor work to a total of $184,000,000. Almost every bureau in this Department shows a very large increase, and certainly this tremendous increase for rivers and harbors is not in any way justified.

The President estimated for deficiencies something like $600,000,000 for the balance of the year 1936. Those unquestionably will arise.

We have from the figures which we have seen before a deficit of $3,366,000,000 on account of regular operations of the Government. For relief the appropriations demanded by the mayors in this morning's papers total, according to Mr. Hopkins, $2,500,000,000. I think it is safe to say that the appropriations asked for by the Executive will not be less than $3,500,000,000, so that the total deficit for the fiscal year 1937 will be $6,866,000,000. The gross debt at this time is about $30,300,000,000, exclusive of the bonus. Counting the bonus in 1937 and counting a deficit of $3,500,000,000 for 1936, the gross debt at the end of 1937 will be $40,666,000,000. The guarantees outstanding of Government obligations to be added to that will at that time run approximately $5,000,000,000.

Is it not time that we stopped this terrific drain on the Treasury of the United States? It is the large item which is preventing the return of prosperity to the American people. I beg of you, not in a partisan manner but as an American citizen, to appreciate the situation into which the Roosevelt administration is dragging the people of the United States.

This debt will not be paid by us in our generation. It will hang over and be a burden, bearing down upon our children's children, and is a threat to the opportunities which will be available to the young people who are coming along today.

Let us have more regard for our responsibilities as legislators. Let us see that the items of expenditures are cut down to the bone and that no wastefulness or extravagance is permitted. [Applause.]

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. Did I understand the gentleman to make the astounding statement that the Budget, as recommended to the Congress, contains an increase for every bureau and agency of the Government, with the possible exception of one, whether it has to do with relief measures or not?

Mr. TABER. That is practically so. I think there are two, as I remember it, one the Council for Aeronautics, and the other the Commerce Department, but the Commerce decrease is only because of the disappearance of a million and a half dollars nonrecurring item; otherwise that shows a million dollars increase.

Mr. MAPES. And with that exception there is only one other possible exception to the statement that I have made.

Mr. TABER. That is as I understand it. There may be one small one, where only a few thousand dollars is involved.

Mr. MAPES. Just one more question. As I understand, the decision of the Supreme Court, which was handed down simultaneously with the reading of the President's Budget message here in the House, puts out of joint, so to speak, the President's Budget to this extent. It decreases the estimated receipts from the processing tax by $547,000,000 and it releases impounded funds from the processing tax of approximately $200,000,000. Besides, there are $236,000,000 due farmers on their allotment contracts.

Mr. TABER. Probably there will come an opportunity to pay $236,000,000 for those contracts, where there has been partial performance.

Mr. MAPES. Making approximately $1,000,000,000 difference in the Budget estimates, as submitted in the President's estimate, within the last week?

Mr. TABER. I think that probably is so—at least that much.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the Budget estimate asked for about $91,000,000 more to pay interest on the Government debt this year than last year?

Mr. TABER. It is nearly $91,000,000 for interest. There is a little increase in the debt-retirement fund which would go into that particular item.

Mr. SNELL. I have seen a great many statements coming from the administration for the last few weeks to the effect that the interest on the national debt is less, even with the increase, than it was before.

Mr. TABER. Less for this current year; 1936 they estimate will be less than for 1935, although for the year 1937 it will be much larger than either.

Mr. SNELL. And that is the increase that is asked for?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CROWE].

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Chairman, the address of President Roosevelt January 3, 1936, delivered before a joint session of the two Houses of Congress and to the Nation, was timely and fitting. Thirty-four months ago, when President Roosevelt ascended the rostrum in front of the Capitol, took the oath of office of President of the United States, and made his address, that address was made to the Congress and to the Nation. It was a first ray of light and like a bright star that suddenly appeared. It was to the Nation like the sun rising on the horizon. Following his inauguration, the great men of the land—industrialists, bankers, and lawyers—came to the President and to the Congress to save them and to save the Nation from the dire distress to which they had plunged it. The Congress and the Nation being his audience then, at a time when everyone almost without exception knew of the bankrupt condition of the Nation, it is certainly fitting and proper at this time that he should again have the same audience. He, quite of right, should desire to point out to the same listeners the changes and betterments of conditions throughout the country now and to point out the improvements that have been made in general conditions.

On that date, March 4, 1933, fear abounded everywhere. Distress was on every hand. The banks of the Nation were closed. Many millions of workingmen were idle. They and their families were hungry. Provision was not made for their maintenance, neither was clothing nor fuel offered them, and the millions idle, mind you, through no fault of their own, but largely because of an industrial condition and because industry had not given thought to the providing of labor for the unemployed. Industry had sought ways and means of saving labor and displacing labor. They had, however, given no attention apparently to finding employment for the labor which they displaced.

We hear much talk today of the national debt and the national debt is a thing to be considered because it must be repaid in taxes, but what of the national debt? What is its present and past status? We find by comparing the record that at the beginning of the Hoover administration that the Federal debt was approximately sixteen and one-half billion dollars, and that it increased approximately $5,000,000,000 during Hoover's term of office, or to a total of twenty-one and one-half billion dollars. During his term of office the income of the Nation declined from around $80,000,000,000 annually to $37,000,000,000. We find that through that and because of that regime banks were compelled to write off in losses more than $1,100,000,000. We find that home owners were faced with foreclosure by the million, as were farmers. We find that farm losses mounted, their interest rates remained the same, but their prices declined to the lowest in the history of the Nation. Corn to 10 cents a bushel, wheat to 25 to 35 cents; hogs to 2 and 2½ cents a pound, and cotton to much less than the cost of production; tobacco also sold for practically nothing. Then the credit of everyone was impaired; the faith in banks was gone; life-insurance companies were in distress; the railroads were limping; in fact, distress and discontent abounded everywhere; and who was there among you who could have said prior to March 4, 1933, that revolution might not take place even here in America! The savings of 23,000,000 bank depositors were jeopardized, as were all life-insurance policies. The losses I have enumerated were not the only losses by any means. The greatest loss perhaps was in the loss of morale; the broken spirits of men and women; the ruined young manhood through discouragement and fear can never be calculated. The home owner who lost his home; the farmer who lost his farm; the factory owner who lost his factory; the grief and heartaches that those people went through, as well as those who through lack of employment lost all of their belongings—many of them will never again be able to recoup.

Today it is a changed picture. Confidence abounds. A million homes have been refinanced and saved to the home owner. A million farms have been refinanced and saved to the farmers. Five million laborers have found gainful employment. Insurance companies are on a solid footing. Our banks have been reopened and are solvent and, thanks to this administration and to the Committee on Banking and Currency, the deposits of the millions of depositors are not only safe but guaranteed up to $5,000. I am glad to have had a hand in the enactment of this particular law. I am a firm believer in it and have actively supported this legislation. Today bank deposits are growing and are now more than $3,000,000,000 above reserve requirements and constantly growing.

INCOME OF NATION INCREASED $23,000,000,000

The national income that had declined to $37,000,000,000 in 1932 has risen in the year 1935 to approximately $60,000,000,000, or an increase of $23,000,000,000; so to those who complain of an increase in the Federal debt during the Roosevelt administration, I remind you that there is something and there will be something with which to pay the increased debt. Moreover, the debt at the present time is not above $30,000,000,000, but is today $28,348,000,000, which is an increase of less than $7,000,000,000 since Mr. Roosevelt went into office. But even though the national debt is increased there is an abundance on the right side of the ledger to show for it. Another interesting thing is the fact that we are paying today on the increased Federal debt more than $100,000,000 less in interest charges than we paid in the last year of the Hoover administration. That saving in itself, added to the greatly increased revenue of the Federal Government, will ultimately retire the Federal debt. Another idea which can be considered on the state of the Union and its improvement is the fact that the home owners of the Nation owe approximately four and one-half billion dollars less today than they did March 4, 1933. The farmers of the Nation owe several billion dollars less than they did at that date, while on the other hand farm products have increased two and one-half billion dollars this year over what they were 3 years ago. This has been due to the legislation which this administration enacted into law, thereby bringing relief to the farmers in the way of increased farm prices. Administrations heretofore have promised relief to the farmers and have promised help. They were, however, promises only, which were not worth the paper they were written on and not worth the efforts made in making them. Not only have the farmers been helped by better prices for crops but lower interest rates have been given those who have secured loans from the Federal land bank, and they are paying much less in interest charges. Likewise, the home owner is paying much less in interest charges.

A. A. A. SUPREME COURT DECISION

Many letters and telegrams from my district since the Supreme Court decision urge new legislation to take the place of the A. A. A. It is imperative new legislation be enacted into law. The "general welfare" of the farmer is the broadest and most far-reaching to be found anywhere. It covers every nook and corner of the United States. A total of 55,000,000 of our 123,000,000 people live either on or directly from the farm. Whenever that large group is in red ink, it follows, as the night the day, all the rest soon follow in distress. The industrialists are protected; accordingly, the farmer must have an equal chance and also be protected. Justice Stone well said in his recent dissenting opinion, in part, as follows:

> As the present depressed state of agriculture is Nation-wide in its extent and effects, there is no basis for saying that the expenditures of public money in aid of farmers is not within the specifically granted power of Congress to levy taxes to provide for the general welfare.

The farmer is the backbone of our Nation; in fact, the backbone of civilization. Before there were machines of any nature, before there were houses of any kind, there was farming after a fashion. Today, in this advanced machine age, the banker, doctor, lawyer, the industrialist finds his table filled with foods grown by a farmer. He finds nothing to take the place of potatoes, bread, pork chops, and beefsteak. Do these people want these foods furnished them at a loss to the farmer? When the farmer is dragged down and loses his buying power the ultimate result is apparent with the utter collapse and break-down of 1929.

Since agriculture is Nation-wide, reaching the entire Nation, with villages and cities dropped down on it here and there, with the inhabitants of them depending on those farmer sons of toil for every morsel of food they eat, for the material for the clothes they wear, and for many other things coming from the farm, is not the dissenting voice of Justice Stone and his associates, Brandeis and Cardozo, logical and conclusive? At least it so occurs to the average man.

Of course, the majority rules, and the decision must and will be accepted; however, a way must and will be found to aid agriculture. Every possible effort will be made to adopt new legislation to fit the views of the Supreme Court. Legislation to aid agriculture, no doubt, will be enacted at this session of Congress, and I intend to personally assist in same any way I can.

STOCKS AND BONDS

The owners of stocks and bonds likewise have benefited during the last 3 years. It is estimated they have increased in value during that time from $5,000,000,000 to $10,000,000,000. Business is steadily improving. I quote by comparison, giving recent figures compared with 1932. A few of them are as follows:

	1932	1935
Industrial production	64.0	97.0
Factory employment	64.2	85.0
Pay rolls	45.3	77.0
Freight loadings	56.7	64.0
Department-store sales	69.0	80.0
Building contracts	28.0	45.0
Wholesale prices	64.8	80.4

I further quote from a man who is considered one of the Nation's greatest statisticians, and of whom it cannot be said that he is thoroughly in accord with the New Deal. I quote from Roger Babson, under date of October 30, 1935. He gives a tabulated report of the percentage of gains of a few of the leading barometers since March 4, 1933, which are as follows:

	Percent
Industrial production	55
Factory pay rolls	92
Automobile sales	512
Steel ingot output	270
Residential building	322
Factory employment	45
Electric power consumed	39
Freight-car loadings	30
Lumber production	186
Rural store sales	112
Department-store sales	49
Corporation profits	85
Stock prices	194
Cash farm income	62
Bank debits	64
Commodity prices	61
New corporate issues	900
National income	25

In spite of this we not only find some, like the dog who bit the hand of the master who fed him, but they would kick the owner of the house out in the cold after they themselves had begged permission and were permitted to enjoy the comforts of the home. Sloan, for instance, of General Motors, is ready to enter his protest against President Roosevelt and the New Deal. He—of all men to complain—with his business, according to Mr. Babson, showing an increase of 512 percent.

But it is to be expected that Mr. Roosevelt will be opposed, maligned, abused, and belied. Any man who stands out, and particularly stands out for the common good, can expect abuse. Any man who touches the purse strings of great wealth can expect to have those same purse strings throttle him if possible to do so. Washington was abused and maligned because he stood out for the interests of the people; so was Jefferson and Jackson. Who was more bitterly denounced than Abraham Lincoln? Denounced even by members of his own Cabinet; yet history reveals these men as being the greatest men of their day. Woodrow Wilson, because he dared stand out for humanity and for the rank and file, suffered criticism and abuses. Theodore Roosevelt came in for his share of abuse and criticism because he dared to stand out for principles and for things that he believed would be in the interest of the masses. Likewise and for the same reasons the present President and those who believe as he does in progressive legislation in the interest of the Nation can expect their full share of criticism and opposition. Nevertheless, the rank and file are with the President and with this administration and will support President Roosevelt at the polls as well as the present Congress which is supporting him.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Indiana [Mrs. JENCKES].

Mrs. JENCKES of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to bring to the attention of the House of Representatives and the Congress a situation which I deem of great importance to every American citizen who believes in true justice.

A citizen of the great Commonwealth of Virginia, Mr. John Cooke Grayson, was indicted June 28, 1933, for allegedly violating the law dealing with the operation of a bank in the District of Columbia.

Mr. Grayson was placed under proper bond by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to await trial. The case was often set for trial, but always postponed on the plea that Mr. Grayson was near death from physical ailments. Mr. Grayson is 64 years old and has been under a $2,000 bond bail since September 25, 1933, shortly after his indictment on two conspiracy charges growing out of the collapse of the Park Savings Bank of the District of Columbia.

Competent medical authorities have repeatedly examined Mr. Grayson and have reported in proper form to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia that Mr. Grayson's health is serious and that his removal from his present abode to Washington for trial would bring on his death.

This information was officially conveyed to the court in regular form by civilian doctors and doctors in the employ of the Federal Government assigned to examine Mr. Grayson.

On January 13, 1936, Justice Daniel W. O'Donoghue, of the District of Columbia Supreme Court, refused a continuance of Mr. Grayson's case and authorized a bench warrant for his immediate arrest. According to newspaper reports Justice O'Donoghue is alleged to have said, "It is better that one man should die in the administration of justice than that the public should lose confidence in its fair administration by the courts. If this man was ill 2 years ago as affidavits at that time stated he would be dead now."

Attorneys for Mr. Grayson advised Justice O'Donoghue that on account of the serious illness of Mr. Grayson they were not ready to proceed with the trial, and produced in court affidavits by three physicians who examined Mr. Grayson Saturday, January 11. All of these affidavits are alleged to have stated that Mr. Grayson might die if he were brought to Washington.

The attorneys for Mr. Grayson advised Justice O'Donoghue that the doctors were in court, and would like to have them be sworn in and testify. Justice O'Donoghue is reported in the newspapers as having said, "I don't care to hear them. This defendant has had more than ample opportunity either to admit his guilt by a plea of guilty or to plead not guilty and demonstrate his innocence."

Justice O'Donoghue proceeded in regular form to order the bond of Mr. Grayson forfeited.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the House of Representatives, I desire to protest against this inhuman and un-American decision of Justice O'Donoghue. I make this protest from the floor of the House of Representatives as a Member of Congress elected by the people, against this inhuman decision of Justice O'Donoghue, who is an appointed servant of the people, and not responsible to the citizens of the District of Columbia, who are subservient to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for the administration of justice.

I protest this horrible decision of Justice O'Donoghue as an American woman. I protest it as an American mother. I protest it as a citizen of the United States who knows that justice in America is always tempered with mercy.

As a woman, I challenge the statement of Justice O'Donoghue that "It is better that one man should die in the administration of justice than that the public should lose confidence in its fair administration by the courts." The action of Justice O'Donoghue in defiance of the statements of the Government's medical authorities and civilian medical authorities in compelling Mr. Grayson to lose his life before he has had a fair trial has and will break down the faith and confidence of every loyal American in the proper administration of justice in the court of Justice O'Donoghue.

The action of Justice O'Donoghue has brought the dignity of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia down to the level of pagan and medieval justice.

I demand, in the name of American womanhood, that the life of John Cooke Grayson should be spared. I have always had great reverence, and shall continue to have great reverence for our American courts. I have great respect for those revered justices who are charged with the administration of the laws enacted by the Congress for the good of the people. I shall always continue to revere and respect our American courts, our justices, our judges, and the members of the bar. But I resent and oppose the deliberate attempt of Justice O'Donoghue to cause the death of Mr. Grayson before he has had a fair trial.

I am not a lawyer. I am an American woman who is capable of exercising good judgment, and I know that the maximum penalty for the crime which Mr. Grayson is charged with is not death. I am not a lawyer, but I know of many instances where the courts have taken more than 2 or 3 years in order that proper justice might prevail.

Therefore I denounce and brand the decision of Justice O'Donoghue as being on a par with the horrible decisions of the pagan courts of the medieval and Roman ages and not worthy of the supreme court of our Nation's Capital. I appeal to the Congress as a woman member of the District of Columbia Committee of the House of Representatives to save Mr. Grayson's life.

From the floor of the House of Representatives I appeal to the first magistrate of the United States, the Honorable Franklin D. Roosevelt, to set aside this inhuman decision of Justice O'Donoghue. I call upon my colleagues in the House of Representatives and the Senate from the great State of Virginia to arouse yourselves and, in the name of justice tempered with mercy, prevent this vile decision from prevailing. I call upon all of the citizens of America to arouse yourselves to a militant antagonism to this terrible decision, which would take a man's life knowingly before he has had proper trial.

I prayerfully appeal to Justice O'Donoghue to retire to the quiet of his judicial quarters and read the Holy Bible, and search for precedent and authority, and appeal to Divine Providence for courage and guidance which will permit him to recall his unhappy ruling and permit Mr. Grayson to live.

The time will never come in America when the people will permit a brutal administration of justice. They will have none of it. I call on the women of America to make militant issue of this situation. If it is allowed to prevail, then all of the cherished institutions which women have worked for and attained in our great Nation are in danger.

I ask the Members of this Congress to take prompt and decisive action in appealing to the President of the United States, and, if necessary, go to the extent of impeaching Justice O'Donoghue for his utter disregard of human life.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9863, the independent offices appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

IMPEACHMENT OF HON. HALSTED L. RITTER

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I realize that the time of adjournment has almost arrived, and I dislike to ask the indulgence of my colleagues for a few minutes, but I shall be just as brief as possible. I rise to a question of constitutional privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of constitutional privilege. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, on my own responsibility, as a Member of this House, I impeach Halsted L. Ritter, a United States district judge for the southern district of Florida, for high crimes and misdemeanors. In substantiation of this impeachment I specify the following charges:

First. I charge that the said Halsted L. Ritter, having been nominated by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate of the United States, duly qualified and commissioned, and while acting as district judge for the southern district of Florida, did on divers and various occasions so abuse the powers of his high office and so misconduct himself as to be guilty of favoritism, oppression, and judicial misconduct, whereby he has brought the administration of justice in said district in the court of which he is judge into disrepute by his aforesaid misconduct and acts, and is guilty of misbehavior and misconduct falling under the constitutional provisions as ground for impeachment and removal from office.

Second. I charge that said Halsted L. Ritter did knowingly and willfully violate his oath to support the Constitution of the United States when he arbitrarily and champertously permitted the filing of a bill of complaint in the Whitehall case on October 11, 1929, and on allowing attorney fees in said case to A. L. Rankin, his former law partner, in the sum of $75,000 on December 24, 1930.

Third. I charge that said Halstead L. Ritter did willfully, unlawfully, and contrary to well-established law and contrary to the Constitution of the United States, on or about December 24, 1930, accept in cash from A. L. Rankin the sum of $2,500.

Fourth. I charge that said Halsted L. Ritter did willfully, unlawfully, and contrary to the well-established law and contrary to the Constitution of the United States, on or about April 14, 1931, accept in cash from A. L. Rankin the sum of $2,000.

Fifth. I charge that said Halsted L. Ritter did over the period of from October 11, 1929, until May 1933, and on numerous occasions, willfully, unlawfully, and knowingly visit the Whitehall receivership property, a hotel, and with members of his family enjoy its meals, beds, pressing service, and general and full hospitality without pay.

Sixth. I charge that said Halsted L. Ritter did during the months of May and June 1933, in Miami, Fla., deliberately, willfully, unlawfully, and in violation of the Constitution of the United States, trade, barter, and exchange his judicial power and authority for a flattering resolution of personal praise, politically passed by the city commission of the city of Miami, Fla., on June 14, 1933.

Seventh. I charge that said Halsted L. Ritter did from October 23, 1931, to December 1933, in what was known as the Trust Co. of Florida cases, knowingly, viciously, and unlawfully attempt to nullify the operations of the laws of the State of Florida and many States in the Union, notwithstanding higher court decisions to the contrary, and did ignore rulings of his immediately superior court. So insistent was Ritter in having his two personal friends appointed receivers that at a hearing while he was absent from the State, he wired the Federal Judge Alexander Akerman to appoint two personal friends.

Upon appeal the circuit court of appeals issued an opinion declaring that the Federal court had no jurisdiction whatsoever in the case and that the properties should be turned back to the State comptroller. Judge Ritter's receivers were in control of the properties for about 8 months and collected $183,000 and expended $156,000 of the same on overhead, receivers' fees, and attorneys' fees, a very small portion of expenditures going to taxes and repairs on the properties. Judge Ritter approved the report of receipts and expenditures without notice to anyone.

After the circuit court had declared that Judge Ritter had no jurisdiction in the cases, and Judge Ritter knew that the mandate was on the way from New Orleans, and knew what the decision was and knew that he had no jurisdiction, yet in the face of all that he entered an order allowing approximately $26,000 of fees to receivers and attorneys. He stated in substance that he would not have his receivers go begging in the State courts.

Eighth. I charge that said Halsted L. Ritter did unconscionably criticize the Chief Executive of our Nation and attempt to drag his high judicial office into politics. In substance he stated that since Democracy has finally cropped into our ranks, the assistant United States district attorney, who was a personal friend of Ritter's, would lose his job, and that he was going to see that the assistant district attorney got a job with a salary commensurate to that theretofore received from the United States Government. It is said that the assistant district attorney was vitally interested in these trust company matters pending in Ritter's court, as heretofore referred to, and was allowed large fees for little service.

Ninth. I further charge that said Halsted L. Ritter has been arbitrary, capricious, and czarlike in the administration of the duties of his high office, and has been grossly and willfully indifferent to the rights of litigants in his court, and that by virtue of his conduct his usefulness as a judicial officer has ceased.

Now, Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I think I should lay before you some of the facts in this case that bring the matter to this House. I want to also advise my colleagues that my action in this matter is clearly one of duty. It is no pleasure to me, I assure you, to impeach any member of the judiciary. I fully appreciate that feeling of respect which should always exist between an attorney and the court. This feeling, of course, was brought more vividly to my mind while I served for 4 years on the bench before my constituents were kind enough to send me here as a Member of this great body.

Many citizens of the southern district of Florida, in which I reside, feel that in Judge Ritter's court justice has been miscarried, and they are now appealing through me to the Congress, as their only court of appeal, to relieve them of this deplorable situation. The only recourse we have is the one which I am resorting to, that of requesting my colleagues to impeach. The House sits as a committee magistrate in matters of this nature, and undoubtedly the evidence is such that in this case Halsted L. Ritter should be committed to the trial body of our legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I could enumerate further charges, but the hour is so late that I regret to take the time of my colleagues. It is not at all a pleasure for me to arise and impeach a member of the judiciary. I assure you I would not do it if we did not have an intolerable, unbearable, reprehensible and most shameless and unusual condition which is miscarrying justice in Halsted Ritter's court.

In May 1933 a resolution was passed by the Seventy-third Congress directing the Judiciary Committee of the House, either as a whole or by subcommittee, to investigate the official conduct of Halsted L. Ritter, a Federal judge for the southern district of Florida. A subcommittee, with Hon. MALCOLM C. TARVER, of George, as chairman, was appointed to conduct the investigation. The subcommittee held hearings in Washington and in Miami, Fla. The testimony was voluminous and very pertinent. The oral testimony has been printed by the Government. An abstract of the testimony has been made at the request of the subcommittee, and said abstract, containing about 60 pages, has been printed by the Government. The abstract is an accurate summary of the evidence, and copies of it are available. Any Member of this body can familiarize himself with the evidence in a short time by studying said abstract.

I am vitally interested in this investigation for two important reasons: First, from a careful study of the evidence I am convinced that Judge Ritter is an ignorant, unjust, tyrannical, and corrupt judge; that a majority of the people in his district have the same convictions that I have; that confidence in him and his court is lacking; that his usefulness as a judge of the southern district of Florida has long since come to an end. Second, a large portion of the district over which Judge Ritter presides is in my congressional district, and my people demand and feel that they are entitled to a judge learned in the law and one who has dignity, honor, and integrity.

Briefly, I will outline some of the evidence manifesting crookedness and official misconduct on the part of Judge Ritter. Then, in conclusion, I will read for you as a part of my speech the report of Hon. MALCOLM C. TARVER, chairman of the subcommittee that conducted the investigation. Let us consider the evidence.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Of course, ordinarily the matter would be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Does the gentleman think he must proceed longer in the matter at this time?

Mr. GREEN. My understanding is, I may say to the chairman of the Rules Committee, that the articles of impeachment will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary for its further consideration and action. I do not intend to consume any more time than is absolutely necessary.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. What action was taken on the Tarver report? If this official is the kind of judge the Tarver report indicates, why was he not then impeached and tried by the Senate?

Mr. GREEN. That is the question that is now foremost in my mind. Since Judge TARVER's service as chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee he has been transferred from the House Judiciary Committee to the House Committee on Appropriations. He is not now a member of the Judiciary Committee.

I firmly believe that when our colleagues understand the situation thoroughly, there will be no hesitancy in bringing about Ritter's impeachment by a direct vote on the floor of the House. My purpose in this is to get it in concrete form, in compliance with the rules of the House, so that the direct impeachment will be handled by the Committee on the Judiciary. At present impeachment is not before the committee. This will give the Judiciary something to act upon.

Mr. BLANTON. Was he not impeached in the House before when the Tarver investigation was made?

Mr. GREEN. No. He was never impeached. There was a resolution passed by the House directing an investigation to be made by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Was that not a resolution that followed just such impeachment charges in the House as the gentleman from Florida is now making?

Mr. GREEN. I understand that articles of impeachment have not been heretofore filed in this case.

Mr. BLANTON. Was the Tarver report, to which the gentleman has referred, filed with the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. GREEN. It is my understanding that it is now in their hands.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman now tell the House that any such report as that was filed with the Judiciary Committee by Judge Tarver, and that that committee took no action whatever?

Mr. GREEN. I would not answer for the Judiciary Committee, but I would say I have the impression that the members of the committee are advised of Judge Tarver's report.

Mr. BLANTON. The members of the Judiciary Committee are good lawyers and are some of the leading, outstanding Members of this House, Members in whom we have absolute confidence. I cannot understand why they have not taken some action.

Mr. GREEN. I hope that our confidence will be made stronger in this committee when they bring out impeachment proceedings. I feel hopeful that the committee will give the matter further consideration as the conditions may warrant and that we will have a chance to vote upon the matter on the House floor.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I cannot yield further at this time.

Mr. MAPES. I make a point of order, Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman does not care to yield.

Mr. GREEN. Go ahead and make the point of order.

Mr. MAPES. My understanding is the gentleman has submitted his impeachment charges.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Not at this time.

Mr. MAPES. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I had hoped to be permitted to ask a question instead.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the gentleman has made his impeachment charges, and for the last 10 minutes has been proceeding almost entirely with an argument and a personal statement which I do not think are in order under the circumstances. I think I will make the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that the gentleman from Florida having raised a question of privilege and having made these charges is entitled to 1 hour on the charges. The gentleman has been recognized and may use all or any portion of the hour he sees fit.

Mr. MAPES. Is the gentleman entitled during that hour to engage in a general discussion of the charges?

The SPEAKER. He is, under all the precedents with which the Chair is familiar.

Mr. GREEN. I shall discuss this evidence very briefly, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to take up any more of the time of the House than I feel I absolutely must take, but this is a matter that is very dear to the heart of every man who wants to see the judiciary of this country occupying the role in our Government which the framers of our Constitution had in mind when they created the three branches of our Government.

I come now to the hotel case. I will briefly outline this case.

WHITEHALL CASE

Whitehall Hotel is a fashionable hotel in Palm Beach, Fla. Judge Ritter testified that it is "an exclusive hotel where the exclusive rich went to hibernate in the wintertime, and they paid fancy prices for their rooms." It had been in bankruptcy in Judge Ritter's court. One Walter Richardson, a Palm Beach attorney, was trustee in the bankruptcy proceedings. Judge Ritter allowed the trustee a fee of $16,800, whereas the trustee's attorney had advised the court that a fee of $6,500 to $6,800 was all that could be allowed under the law. Judge Ritter replied that he would not let anybody tell him what compensation he would allow his trustees.

Desiring to retain control of Whitehall Hotel, the said Walter Richardson, and one A. L. Rankin, who was Judge Ritter's former law partner, and others formed a conspiracy to start foreclosure of the first-trust mortgage on the hotel and to have said Richardson appointed receiver. The evidence shows that they interested Judge Ritter in the scheme and that Judge Ritter went along. They learned that Judge Bert E. Holland, of Boston, held sufficient bonds for their purpose. Without full knowledge of their plans, Judge Holland authorized A. L. Rankin to bring the suit in his name. However, before the suit was filed, Judge Holland got suspicious that something improper was brewing, and wired A. L. Rankin, former partner of Judge Ritter, not to file the suit, and not to ask for receiver. Rankin ignored the instructions of his client and filed the suit, anyway. At the time suit was filed in Judge Ritter's court, Rankin wrote the clerk of court that it was very important that a receiver be appointed immediately, and requested the clerk to lock up the bill of complaint as soon as it was filed and hold it until Judge Ritter returned, so that it would not have any newspaper publicity before Judge Ritter heard the application for appointment of receiver. Judge Holland heard through accident that a hearing for appointment of receiver had been set. He went to Miami and discharged Rankin as his lawyer and told Judge Ritter he wanted the case dismissed, that he did not want a receiver appointed, and that Rankin had no further authority to represent him in the case. Judge Ritter told Judge Holland that he would not permit out-of-State clients to start suits in his court and then dismiss them. Judge Ritter then appointed the said Walter Richardson as receiver. Rankin continued to act as attorney for Judge Holland, without authority, and with full knowledge on the part of Judge Ritter that Rankin had been discharged as attorney in the case.

At this point they appear to have accomplished their design. They have control of the Whitehall property. One Walter Richardson is receiver; another, A. L. Rankin, former partner of Judge Ritter, is conducting the case without a client, without authority, and after he had been discharged from the case. Another, Judge Halsted L. Ritter, is sitting on the bench receiving and dispensing large sums as spoils and favors. He does not permit a plaintiff who has been trapped and deceived by his lawyers to dismiss his case. He does not permit that same plaintiff to discharge his lawyer, A. L. Rankin, who started the suit in violation of positive instructions.

Then the mill begins to grind. A. L. Rankin, former partner of Judge Ritter, applies to Judge Ritter for advance on fees and is allowed $2,500. Shortly thereafter more fees are asked for. Judge Ritter evidently fearing his conduct was too bold writes Judge Akerman to fix the fee for A. L. Rankin in the case. Judge Akerman swore that he fixed $15,000 as Rankin's total fee.

Judge Ritter was not supposed to know at this stage whether A. L. Rankin would win the case or whether he would be entitled to any fee from the court. Shortly thereafter Judge Ritter plays Santa Claus in a big way.

After Judge Akerman had fixed the total fee for Rankin at Judge Ritter's request, and when no more work had been done in the case except the drafting of a short final decree, Judge Ritter signs a final decree on December 24, 1930, allowing A. L. Rankin, his former partner, an additional fee of $75,000. On the very same day and out of the $75,000 fee just allowed him, A. L. Rankin stalks stealthily into Judge Ritter's private office with $2,500 cash in his pockets, and, behind closed doors in the presence of no one but himself and Judge Ritter, he places the $2,500 cash in Judge Ritter's hands. A short time later Rankin collects the balance of his $75,000 fee and again turns his footsteps toward Judge Ritter's private office with $2,000 cash in his pockets. In the same manner as before he placed the $2,000 cash in Judge Ritter's hands. Shortly thereafter Judge Ritter deposited $1,100 cash in the bank and has never yet given satisfactory explanation of where he got it.

Now, what is the excuse for Judge Ritter accepting this cash out of a fee he had just allowed his former partner? One excuse is that Judge Ritter sold Rankin his stock in a bus company, but the evidence shows the stock was worthless and that Judge Ritter continued to hold the stock and was president of the company for nearly 2 years thereafter. Another excuse is that Judge Ritter sold Rankin his interest in the law books and office furniture of the partnership when the judge went on the bench, but the evidence shows that Judge Ritter had the following books and furniture: Cook on Corporations, five volumes; Carsons Florida Common Law Pleading, one volume; General Laws of Florida, 1921, 1923, and 1925, three volumes; Jones Legal Forms, one volume; Revised General Statutes, 1920; Mills 1923 Code and Mills Statutes for 5 years; one desk, one cabinet, and three chairs. (See exhibit 46.)

Reliable attorneys say that all the books and furniture were not worth more than one or two hundred dollars, yet Judge Ritter claims to have sold them to his former partner for $5,000. Another excuse is that Judge Ritter sold Rankin his interest in the cases on hand when he went on the bench, but the evidence shows that Judge Ritter continued to get his interest in the fees collected from the old business for a long time after he went on the bench and that Judge Ritter collected three fees from the partnership business some time after he went on the bench—one of $2,000, one of $120, and one of $32.66—and never reported these fees to Rankin.

The evidence further shows that while the Whitehall Hotel was in the hands of receiver, Judge Ritter, his wife, son, daughter, secretary, and her husband stopped at the hotel five or six times, occupied expensive rooms, took meals in the dining room, sent clothes to the cleaners, and never offered to pay for said services but had the bills charged to the receivership.

A. L. Rankin was asked why he gave Judge Ritter all this money in cash instead of checks. This in substance is his reply: The reason that actuated my giving him cash is this—I thought that there might be some criticism directed to Judge Ritter should I give him checks, in view of the fact that I was his former partner, and people might misconstrue why I was giving him checks.

After Judge Ritter went on the bench Rankin paid him money for his part of fees collected from the partnership business on several occasions, but always by check. Then comes the enormous Whitehall fee of $75,000 allowed by Judge Ritter, and Rankin gives Judge Ritter $4,500 cash out of said fee.

I will now discuss what is known as the Power case.

POWER CASE

About March 1, 1933, the Miami City Commission passed an ordinance reducing electric rates to consumers approximately 29 percent.

This is why they wanted a lower rate in Miami: According to an Associated Press dispatch of February 3, 1935, the following are some of the power rates in the country:

An electric-rate study which showed variations ranging from 60 cents for 15 kilowatt-hours in Cleveland to $1.71 for the same amount of current in Miami, Fla., were made public February 3, 1935, by the Federal Power Commission. The survey said Cleveland also had the lowest charge among cities of 100,000 or more for 25 kilowatt-hours. The rate was 88 cents, followed by Washington, D. C., 98 cents; the highest being Miami, $2.76. For kilowatt-hours, the report said, Cleveland rates $1.31, while Miami tops the list with $4.18.

The highest power rate in the United States was what Halstead Ritter corruptly used his judicial power to uphold. The Florida Power & Light Co., the holder of franchises to furnish electric current, filed suit in Judge Ritter's court to enjoin the enforcement of said ordinance. Judge Ritter granted the injunction in 9 days after suit was filed. The city of Miami filed motion to dismiss the bill of complaint on legal grounds. Before the motion was disposed of, before any answers were filed, before the case was at issue, and when no party to the cause had asked for appointment of master, Judge Ritter appointed one Cary T. Hutchinson as special master, with power and very flattering compensation. The city of Miami conducted an investigation into the fitness of the said Hutchinson to act as master and found that for many years the said Hutchinson had been in the employ of Federal Light & Traction Co., as well as Cities Service and Sanderson & Porter, and that he maintained offices with Sanderson & Porter at 52 William Street, New York City.

Judge Ritter appointed the said Hutchinson without notice to the city and at a time when no one was present but an attorney for the power company. The case on the part of the city was in the hands of the city commission, the rate and traffic board, and the city's counsel, among whom was Hon. Charles A. Russell, of Washington, D. C., a utility lawyer of national reputation. Those handling the case for the city felt outraged at the appointment of Hutchinson as special master and felt that the city's case was already lost. They resorted to all legal means available to get Judge Ritter to vacate the appointment, but he refused to do so. So incensed were the members of the city commission and of the rate and traffic board and of the city's counsel that some of them, with the assistance of others, became quite active in gathering and furnishing information to this body for the purpose of having a congressional investigation of the official conduct of Judge Ritter. Congress passed such a resolution in May 1933. The city of Miami had its special counsel, Mr. Russell, prepare notice of appeal and petition for disqualification of Judge Ritter in the power case. These papers were sent by Russell to one G. A. Worley, local counsel for the city of Miami, for filing. Worley did not file them for reasons which I will give you.

Up to the time Congress passed a resolution for his investigation Judge Ritter had been firm and unmovable in his refusal to vacate appointment of Hutchinson, and those representing the city, it is said, had been outspoken in their lack of faith and confidence in Judge Ritter. But when Congress passed the resolution the whole situation soon began to have a different atmosphere.

Somehow Judge Ritter happened to have some conference with G. A. Worley, one of local counsel for the city of Miami, about opposition to Judge Ritter on the part of certain city officials and about getting the city to pass a resolution expressing faith and confidence in the honesty and integrity of Judge Ritter. G. A. Worley, as a go-between, also held conferences with certain officials of the city who were active in the power case, and likewise held conferences with attorneys for the power company and with some of the attorneys representing Judge Ritter in this investigation concerning methods of getting rid of Hutchinson as master in the case and concerning the city passing a resolution expressing faith in Judge Ritter's honesty. Apparently Judge Ritter was greatly troubled by this investigation and wanted all the support he could get. As a result of the conferences just mentioned, a trade was made by Judge Ritter with the city. The terms of the trade were that the city would pass a resolution publicly expressing faith and confidence in Judge Ritter's honesty and integrity and Judge Ritter would in turn disqualify himself in the power case and would see that Hutchinson got out of the way and a new master agreeable to the city was appointed.

The city passed a resolution expressing confidence in Judge Ritter's honesty on June 14, 1933. The people of Miami were watching the power case carefully and wondered why the resolution was passed by the city commission. Then there was a leak. The public found out about the trade with Judge Ritter. There was criticism and comment everywhere. G. A. Worley testified that "water got too muddy" to go further with the trade at that time. However, sometime later Judge Ritter did disqualify himself in the case and Hutchinson stepped aside and a new master was appointed. So Judge Ritter swapped his judicial powers and actions in the power case to get the city to abandon its hostile attitude toward him in the congressional investigation.

Mr. Speaker, the future of our Nation is in a pitiable state if the House of Representatives should uphold a district judge who will barter, trade, and exchange his judicial authority and power, his office, if you please, for a mess of political pottage in the form of a flattering resolution passed by a city commission in order to help him out in a congressional investigation. The evidence before the Committee on the Judiciary shows that this situation actually existed.

FRANCIS MATTER

Next I will discuss what is known as the Francis matter. One J. R. Francis, of Flint, Mich., had invested nearly a million dollars in Florida real estate and had become entangled in legal difficulties on account thereof. Judge Ritter received his appointment to the bench in February of 1929. On April 19, 1929, the said J. R. Francis gave Judge Ritter a present of $7,500 in cash. Judge Ritter's reason for the gift was that he and his wife found a vacant lot on Rivo Alto Island which was offered for $7,500 cash. Judge Ritter stated that he told Mr. Francis about the lot and told Mr. Francis he did not have the money with which to purchase it. He said that Mr. Francis gave him a check for $7,500 with which to buy the lot and that Judge Ritter was to hold the lot in trust. However, title to the lot was taken in Judge Ritter's name and probably still stands in Judge Ritter's name, and Judge Ritter says that after Mr. Francis died his widow told him that Mr. Francis intended that Judge Ritter should have the lot free of charge and that Judge Ritter was not indebted to the Francis estate in any manner. While the evidence is not conclusive as to misconduct in the Francis matter, yet the entire transaction is very suspicious.

It is very unusual for Federal judges to be handed $7,500 gifts unless there is some sinister motive back of it. It is a further illustration of Judge Ritter's judicial unfitness.

TRUST CO. OF FLORIDA CASES

I will next discuss in a very brief way what is known as the Trust Co. of Florida cases. The Trust Co. of Florida and the Marion Mortgage Co. were trustees for bond issues covering nearly 100 valuable hotels and apartment houses and other properties in the State of Florida.

These bond issues were placed during 1925 and 1926, which years marked the real-estate boom years in Florida. After the boom collapsed practically all of these bond issues became in default. The Trust Co. of Florida was in financial difficulties. The State comptroller took over the Trust Co. of Florida and the various properties and placed the properties in the hands of the liquidators under the State law.

According to the evidence, certain attorneys and others, aided and abetted by Judge Ritter, conspired to gain control of the various properties for which the Trust Co. of Florida and its affiliates were acting as trustees. Judge Ritter, in violation of law, took jurisdiction of these various trust properties and ousted the State liquidators and appointed as receiver-trustees two of his close, personal friends and two men who knew they were going to be appointed receivers before the hearing was had. The one who instituted the champertous litigation in Judge Ritter's court spent much in contacting bondholders and gathering data, and is said to have made lavish promises in the way of receiverships, in the placing of insurance, and of fat salaries and attorneys' fees in order to get the support of necessary parties to bring the suit. One of the attorneys, it is said, boasted that he had the inside track with the judge, and that the judge wanted "another crack" at the trust-company properties. So insistent was Judge Ritter in having his two personal friends appointed receivers, that at a hearing while he was absent from the State he wired Federal Judge Akerman to appoint his two personal friends.

Upon appeal the circuit court of appeals issued an opinion declaring that the Federal court had no jurisdiction whatsoever in the case and that the properties should be turned back to the State comptroller. Judge Ritter's receivers were in control of the properties for about 8 months and collected $183,000, and expended $156,000 of the same on overhead, receivers' fees, and attorneys' fees, a very small portion of expenditures going to taxes and repairs on the properties. Judge Ritter approved the report of receipts and expenditures without notice to anyone.

After the circuit court had declared that Judge Ritter had no jurisdiction in the cases and Judge Ritter knew that the mandate was on the way from New Orleans and knew what the decision was and knew that he had no jurisdiction, yet in the face of all that he entered an order allowing approximately $26,000 of fees to receivers and attorneys. He stated, in substance, that he would not have his receivers go begging in the State courts. He also stated that since democracy had finally crept into our ranks, the assistant United States district attorney, who was a personal friend of Judge Ritter, would lose his job, and that he was going to see that the assistant district attorney got a job with a salary commensurate to that theretofore received from the United States Government. The assistant district attorney was vitally interested in these trust-company matters pending in Judge Ritter's court and was allowed large fees for practically no service. After the circuit court of appeals had rendered its opinion stating that Judge Ritter had no jurisdiction in the cases, it is said that Judge Ritter told the attorneys for the State comptroller that he would enter any sort of order they desired, provided they would not appeal from his allowance of fees to his receivers and attorneys.

This was a case of champertous action instituted by close, personal friends of Judge Ritter, and Judge Ritter gave valuable suggestions in the preparing of the bill of complaint for the suit and went beyond the bounds of propriety in having his two personal friends appointed receivers.

After he had been ousted from jurisdiction by the circuit court of appeals, he allowed thousands of dollars as fees to receivers and attorneys and agreed to enter any sort of order in the case, provided no appeal would be taken from such allowances. The testimony in the Trust Co. of Florida case is very voluminous, and time does not permit me to go further into it.

Along this line and in this connection, may I say that I decry the practice of any Chief Executive in any administration who undertakes to pick a man from one section of the country and send him to another section of the country to occupy some appointive position. Some 65 or 70 years ago this practice was called carpetbagging. I charge that Judge Halsted Ritter is in the plainest and the simplest sense a carpetbagger. He had been in Florida but a short while—probably a year or two—before he was appointed as a Federal judge by President Calvin Coolidge. Many of Judge Ritter's decisions that have been appealed have gone on the rocks, just like the decisions of inferior judges who know little law and care less about its application.

Rather than to comment further, may I ask unanimous consent to have the Clerk read a portion of the report of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] in this case?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

RITTER CASE—VIEWS OF REPRESENTATIVE M. C. TARVER

In submitting the following views concerning the investigation of the official conduct of Halsted L. Ritter, judge, District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida, had under House Resolution 163, Seventy-third Congress, first session, I am discharging a duty which would be much more pleasantly performed if the conclusions reached could have been favorable to his exoneration. Having been transferred to another committee of the House of Representatives since I served as chairman of the Ritter subcommittee, I have no part in the responsibilities of the committee as to further action; but I owe to them the submission of a frank statement as to my conclusions from the evidence submitted herein while I acted in their behalf and by their authority.

At the outset I wish to make clear that by referring to certain pages of the record I am merely pointing out striking features of the case concerning which no man can form a fair opinion without reading the entire record.

Halsted L. Ritter, then a resident of the State of Colorado, removed to Florida in December 1925. (See p. 405 of hearings.) His practice as a lawyer in Florida was first as an employee of the firm of which Congressman WILCOX was a member, and afterward as member of the firm of Ritter & Rankin. (See p. 406.)

PARTNERSHIP AND TRANSACTIONS WITH RANKIN

In 1926 he formed a partnership with Albert L. Rankin. (See p. 406.) The firm, known as Ritter & Rankin, did not have a large practice. Rankin, it appears, claims to have paid an income tax on gross income of $4,621.57 (p. 447) for the year preceding his partner's elevation to the bench, but the first year after Ritter's appointment his gross income was $15,580 (p. 279). This partnership continued until the elevation of Judge Ritter to the bench on February 25, 1929. Shortly before the appointment of Judge Ritter, Rankin, being in financial difficulties, informed one of his creditors that his partner was "going to be appointed Federal judge and he would have some money shortly after that took place" (p. 10). In this statement he appears to have been justified as his income for the calendar years 1929–30–31–32 very greatly increased over his income for previous years. It is, of course, probable in this connection that many clients sought his services because of their knowledge of his previous partnership with the judge and without impropriety on his part. The Silver case (see p. 284 et seq.) appears to be one in which his selection as counsel after other counsel had failed was probably on account of his influence with the judge, and the successful consummation of the case after Rankin had been employed is significant in the light it throws on Rankin's rising income after his partner was appointed judge. In dissolving the partnership of Ritter & Rankin, there was an agreement that the judge would retain his interest in certain fees (p. 20 et seq.). He thereafter received on this account $4,899. These moneys were received by check (pp. 17–20 et seq. and p. 441). There was nothing not open and above board about these transactions, except that $2,000 paid after the judge went on the bench is said to have been an "extra" fee influenced by "psychological" reasons (p. 445). Whether there was an agreement as to Rankin paying Ritter anything other than his proportion of these fees for his interest in the partnership is one of the disputed issues in this case. One of these fees amounting to $2,000 the judge received in entirety (p. 445). The partnership library was of little value (pp. 142–187–191). See also Rankin's statement to the investigator as to what he bought (p. 137). No written contract was made which in itself is an extraordinary circumstance, if a one-half interest in property, the whole of which is now claimed to have been worth $10,000 was disposed of (p. 22). No due date as to Rankin's alleged obligation to Ritter of $5,000 was agreed upon (p. 86). No demand was ever made for payment (p. 22). No payments were made thereon between the time Ritter went on the bench February 25, 1929, and the date Rankin paid him part of the huge fee allowed him for services of a minor character in the Whitehall case (Dec. 24, 1930), although Rankin was in receipt of a considerable income which for the year 1929 was $15,580. The payment when made was intentionally in cash so as to avoid the record of a check to Judge Ritter (pp. 17–19). Ritter placed $500 of this cash in a box and did not deposit it in the bank until almost 7 months later (p. 421). Two thousand dollars of it was withheld from deposit for 5 days. This payment was $2,500. On that date Rankin received $30,000 of the fee allowed him. Later, when he got the remainder of his fee, he gave Ritter an additional $2,000 (p. 18). These facts do not harmonize with the contention that there was a sale by Ritter to Rankin of a one-half interest in the partnership property and that the $4,500 paid him was in part settlement of this debt. Rankin claims that later he paid Ritter on this alleged debt an additional $500. It is significant that these payments from other funds were made by checks and not in cash. Only the payments from the Whitehall fee were made in cash (pp. 18 and 19).

WHITEHALL CASE

Before concluding, however, that this transaction was venal and corrupt, let us examine the facts in the Whitehall case to determine whether Judge Ritter had been guilty of judicial misconduct resulting to the financial benefit of Rankin and offering a more reasonable explanation of the payment to him of $4,500 from the proceeds of Rankin's fee in this case than the alleged partnership transaction.

The Whitehall suit was champertously brought. It was not a case of parties at interest seeking the protection of the courts.

It was a case of parties who had no financial interest in the property seeking to enlist the aid of plaintiffs in an action they proposed to bring so that they might secure control of the property with resultant large fees for services as attorneys and as receivers. Richardson and Rankin were two of the principal members of this conspiracy. A careful examination of Rankin's evidence and the documents introduced relative to the stirring up of this suit establishes this fact incontrovertibly. It was necessary under Florida law to bring the action they mediated in the names of plaintiffs holding $50,000 worth of the first-mortgage bonds (p. 76). If Richardson was to benefit, it was necessary to present the petition for action to a friendly judge, who would appoint him receiver. So pending arrangements with Bert E. Holland, who controlled $50,000 worth of the first-mortgage bonds, to act as plaintiff, Richardson and Rankin went to New York to see Judge Ritter, who was holding court there (pp. 31 et seq.). Did Rankin only talk to him about another matter, as he contends? Who could know except Ritter and Rankin? Must we accept their statements the Whitehall matter was not discussed? Let us not do so unless that statement has the ring of truth in the light of subsequent developments.

On October 10, 1928, Holland wired Rankin not to file the suit (pp. 56 et seq., also p. 150 et seq.). Rankin filed it anyway. Before receiving Holland's wire he had wired Holland he would not file it until the next day (p. 58). He claims he had already mailed it to the clerk. There is no evidence of this except his statement. (See clerk's evidence, pp. 5–6–8.) In a letter mailed either before or after Holland's telegram he did transmit the suit to the clerk (p. 12). It had not been received by the clerk when Holland's telegram was received by Rankin, because it was not filed until the following day. In his letter of transmittal he instructed the clerk to keep the filing of the suit secret (pp. 62–63). No question should exist in any lawyer's mind as to the power and duty of an attorney instructed by a client on October 10 not to file a suit to prevent its being actually filed on October 11, either by stopping the letter to the clerk in transit or by calling the clerk on the phone and withdrawing the instruction to file it. He made no effort to stop the filing (p. 58). Judge Ritter is blamable with that misconduct on the part of counsel only if it was part of a conspiracy to which he was a party or if, with knowledge of it, he approved it.

He did approve it. The facts were made to appear before him on the hearing had October 28, 1929. Holland appeared in open court and stated the facts and stated his desire that the action for receivership not proceed (pp. 63–151–167–308–309). Without him, there was no plaintiff with sufficient ownership of first-mortgage bonds to maintain the action. Did Judge Ritter indignantly rebuke Rankin for filing action in behalf of a client who had instructed him not to do it? By no means. On the contrary, he announced his determination to allow the action to proceed despite Holland's position, and appointed Richardson receiver over the protest of attorneys who advised the court of his part in the instigation of the litigation (pp. 326–327). His conduct on this hearing alone, dissociated from the proven charge that he afterward received money for his judicial misconduct in this case, amply warrants impeachment.

The receivership proceeded. Property worth 3½ million dollars was involved, although it eventually sold for $1,500,000 (p. 74).

The judge on occasion visited the receivership property, a hotel, and with members of his family enjoyed its hospitality without pay (p. 170 et seq.). In the course of the proceedings he allowed Rankin $2,500 on his fee (p. 12). Did Rankin pay any of this on the alleged debt to Ritter? Not one cent. Afterward the judge referred the matter of Rankin's full fee to Judge Akerman. At that time he evidenced an unwillingness to pass on the matter himself. But Akerman only allowed him $12,500 more. He intended it for his full fee (pp. 14–146). Rankin paid Ritter none of this $12 500 (p. 19).

Another fee of $75,000, of which $39,500 was paid to others by Rankin, was subsequently allowed in the final disposition of the case, making $90,000 in all. His reasons for dividing his fee with other attorneys and the receiver, also allowed fees by the court, appear on pages 24 et seq. Rankin's own doubt as to whether this fee might later be taken away from him as improperly granted is frankly admitted by him in explaining why he did not report it in his income-tax return for 1930 (pp. 272 et seq.). Judge Ritter did not have any qualms about fixing this fee, as he had had when he previously had referred the matter to Akerman (p. 15 and exhibit no. 7). What service had Rankin done? The record is ominously silent except that he participated in filing the action and perhaps in drafting the final decree (p. 14 et seq.). He himself claims that he "probably" performed some voluntary service for the receiver for whom he was not attorney. Later in his testimony he stated that he thought he had prepared an amended complaint (p. 66). Judge Ritter excuses himself for signing this decree because it had been agreed to by counsel. It may well be inferred from this record that counsel for those really entitled to the control of this property were anxious to get it out of Judge Ritter's court. It is evident that a decree satisfactory to his erstwhile partner was necessary to that end. Aside from that, a judge who allows exorbitant fees to be taken out of the property of litigants, even though the attorneys for the litigants who receive them agree to the amounts, is not blameless if he fails to exercise some judgment as to whether the fees have been justly earned. A judge owes a duty in this respect to the litigants as well as to the lawyers.

Did Rankin feel that he was the recipient of a judicial favor in the allowance of this fee? He gave the judge $4,500 of it upon a mythical debt that he had not recognized during the 2 years of its alleged existence, upon which he had paid nothing when he got his first $2,500, nothing when he got the next $12,500, nothing from any fee that he had received during his increasing prosperity after his partner had gone on the bench. He did not pay it openly by check like an honest debtor, as he had paid the judge his part of certain fees earned by the partnership, but he cashed a check payable to himself and carried the judge the cash "for fear his action if known might be misconstrued." He did not even take a receipt. He did not even want a canceled check to show, if he or the judge should die, that he had paid his debt.

Did the judge receive it like one accepting his just dues? He placed a part of it away in a box for many months (p. 421). He made conflicting statements to a Department of Justice investigator as to where he got it when the record of his final deposit of it in the bank was discovered (p. 425). He accepted this money, not like an honest man, but remarkably according to what one would believe would be the conduct of a corrupt judge receiving financial benefits accruing to him because of official misconduct. That, in my opinion, after hearing the evidence in the case, is the only language which can adequately describe his conduct, and I regretfully find it my duty to so state.

A significant side light upon the judge's actions in the receivership case is his action in the bankruptcy case involving the same property which had preceded it, and in which the same Walter S. Richardson had served as trustee and was allowed by the judge fees aggregating $16,800, although he was advised by the trustee's own attorney that under the law he could only allow between $6,500 and $6,800 (pp. 35, 36, 46, 47 et seq.). It sustains the conclusion that the judge has no hesitancy in violating express statutes when distributing largess from estates under his jurisdiction to his friends.

Another significant act of favoritism was his decision in the bankruptcy proceedings of Walter S. Richardson allowing his wife to retain $3,500 worth of furniture which he admitted in rendering the decision was under the Florida law the property of Richardson and therefore subject to the claims of his creditors (p. 181 et seq.).

FLORIDA POWER & LIGHT CO. CASE

The evidence in the other cases investigated by your committee is important in that, having gained an opinion of his character from his conduct in the Whitehall case, actions of Judge Ritter in these other matters which might otherwise be attributed to ignorance or given a more innocent construction than corruption assume a sinister tint. In the Florida Power & Light Co. case it appears that the city commission of Miami, dissatisfied with the judge's premature appointment (see p. 466) of a special master in a rate case who they thought was unduly favorable to power interests, sought his removal; and, being unable to persuade the judge to accord with them, participated in the agitation which resulted in the passage of the resolution under which this investigation was had (pp. 567–626). The evidence of Morris L. Cooke, now Director of Rural Electrification, was among other affidavits submitted to the judge and showed clearly the unfitness of the special master, but he declined to remove him (p. 452 et seq.).

The evidence of the city attorney, G. A. Worley, while it does not show an agreement in so many words, does show an understanding to the effect that if the city commission would pass a resolution commending the judge the city would be rid of this special master (p. 516 et seq.; also pp. 27–228). (See also his letter to Charles A. Russell, p. 464, and evidence Robert J. Boone, pp. 578 et seq.; and O'Bryan, p. 582, and others.) The resolution was passed (p. 499). The judge failed to deliver the goods for a while because news of this deal became circulated (p. 532), but finally disqualified, making it possible for another judge to appoint a different special master (p. 465). He insists that he was not in fact disqualified (p. 665). There are some questions involved as to his right to have appointed a special master at all until issue had been joined in the case; but the outstanding fact is that he swapped a judicial action, disqualifying himself in a case where he insists no disqualification existed as payment for the abandonment by the city of Miami of its hostile attitude toward him in the investigation. I see no difference between trading judicial power corruptly for a consideration of this sort and trading it for money, as I am convinced was done in the Whitehall case.

J. R. FRANCIS TRANSACTION

In the matter of the investigation of the gift of $7,500 to Judge Ritter by J. R. Francis, I do not believe that the evidence justifies a finding that this money was corruptly received.

TRUST CO. OF FLORIDA CASES

The proceedings in the Trust Co. of Florida cases evidence biased judicial conduct and ignorance of law, and a persistence in following a course which had been held erroneous by the circuit court of appeals after that court had reversed his judgment. I feel that this part of the evidence is valuable in enabling one to get a clearer picture of the judge and his attitude toward his judicial duties, and especially is this true of his decree when he finally agreed to turn the properties involved loose from his court, but required as a condition precedent that counsel should agree not to appeal from his order fixing fees to the receivers and their attorneys, although under the judgment of the circuit court of appeals he had no authority to pass such an order, much less to require it should not be appealed from (p. 216).

The evidence of George C. Stembler, Raymond W. Butler, George W. Langford, L. M. Gerstel, and Glenn B. Skipper (pp. 193–201) show unsavory facts as to the inception of this litigation. It is also to be noted that the judge's sister, Mrs. Wickard, was employed by the receiver appointed by the judge and whose fees he insisted on paying, without authority, as manager of one of the receivership properties (p. 264). She had no previous experience of this character (p. 266).

His conduct throughout these cases is consistent with the picture of an unjust, tyrannical, and corrupt judge, clearly delineated by the evidence in the Whitehall case.

CONCLUSION

I therefore respectfully submit my conclusion from the foregoing facts that the said Halsted L. Ritter, judge, United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors warranting the preference in proper form of articles of impeachment.

Respectfully submitted.

M. C. TARVER,
Chairman, Subcommittee.

CONCLUSION

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, what I have just read to you is the label placed on the conduct of Judge Ritter by the chairman of the subcommittee that conducted the investigation. Mr. TARVER is a most fair-minded man. He, himself, has had a great deal of experience on the bench. He has remarkable judicial temperament and judgment. His views in this matter are amply sustained by the evidence and the record.

This is a very important and a very serious matter. The judiciary of this country must be kept up to high standards and above reproach. It is impossible to maintain respect for law and order and government with men like Judge Ritter sitting on the bench.

There should be no doubt in anyone's mind as to what course this body should pursue. Appropriate action, such as the record in this case demands, should be taken promptly and prosecuted with dispatch.

I hope that between now and tomorrow the Members will have an opportunity, or take the opportunity, to read this entire matter, which will take only a few minutes. I shall not take any more of your time, but I do want to ask the cooperation of the Members of the House to do their full duty when this resolution comes up for consideration, and it is, I hope, coming up, whether brought up by the minority or the majority of the committee.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. I have great respect for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER] and any conclusion which he might reach. However, I do not see any member of the Committee on the Judiciary present. I have never head of this judge, and I know nothing of the facts in the case. One of the Members of the House has indicated to me, since the gentleman from Florida took the floor, that the Committee on the Judiciary this morning in executive session reached a conclusion opposite from the conclusion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TARVER]. Can the gentleman from Florida inform us with reference to this matter?

Mr. GREEN. I have no official information on that matter.

Mr. MAPES. I have no information about it except that one Member told me he thought that was the fact.

Mr. GREEN. I have no official information on the matter.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I move that the proceedings be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 15, 1936

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We beseech Thee, O Lord, our God, that Thou wilt be pleased to remember today our needs. Grant, our Father in Heaven, that each of us, in aspiration, in hope, and in gladness, may receive that help which human nature and circumstances require. Turn bad habits into good ones; change selfishness into benevolence; convert unloveliness into loveliness; and lead us on where love divine most richly glows. Remind us, dear Lord, that it is only under Thy guidance that we find our true selves. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JACKSON DAY ADDRESS

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein an address of Governor Earle, of Pennsylvania, made on January 8, Jackson Day, in Philadelphia.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to know whether it is the custom to permit the remarks of Governors of States to be included in the RECORD. I do not know whether it is or not, and I am asking the question for my own information; and I hope someone on the majority or minority side will inform me as to the custom.

Mr. WOODRUM. Certainly the Governor of such a great State as Pennsylvania ought to have the right to have his remarks incorporated in the RECORD.

Mr. SNELL. They so seldom have a Democratic Governor in that State I certainly think he should be allowed to have his remarks included in the RECORD.

Mr. WOODRUM. Even on the general state of the Union.

Mr. RICH. I appreciate, of course, that Pennsylvania is a great State, and I just wanted to know the custom.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Hon. George H. Earle, Governor of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia on January 8 in observance of Andrew Jackson Day:

We are here tonight to pay tribute to a man of the people, a figure who stands out against the skyline of our history. Andrew Jackson, "Old Hickory", hero of New Orleans, was every inch a man—a fighting man, a man of principles and convictions, a man of indomitable courage, above all a man who loved his country deeply and sincerely. He was a Democrat in the highest and finest sense of the word, and he brought to American democracy a new meaning. He swept aside the shabby pretenses of the liberty leaguers of his day, scorned their hypocrisy, and took his orders direct from the people.

We need not point to the fact that Jackson was the Franklin Roosevelt of his day. He, too, found that the rich and powerful were using the Government for their selfish purposes.

Let me quote for a moment from one of his speeches: "Many of our rich men", said Andrew Jackson, "have besought us to make them richer by acts of Congress. By attempting to gratify their desires we have in the results of our legislation arrayed section against section, interest against interest, and man against man, in a fearful commotion which threatens to shake the foundations of our Union."

As we gather here tonight the battle lines are tightening for the coming campaign. Big business is "ganging up" on President Roosevelt. Without candidates or program, without principles or any clear conception of where it is heading, big business is determined to smash liberal democracy in the United States, to save the country for the utilities, the big bankers, and the Wall Street stock-exchange plungers.

We know what they mean by "ganging up." We have seen big business gang up on the workingman. We have seen big business gang up on the utility rate payer, on the small merchant, on the farmer, and home owner.

They say they are ganging up on the President. Actually they are ganging up on America. They are ganging up on the American system of living. They are ganging up on the American ideal of democracy. Their attack is more than a fight against a political party—it is a deliberate and unscrupulous attempt to put the money changers back in the temple, to create an autocracy of wealth more tyrannical than any people have seen since the dawn of history. It makes no difference to them what party is in power so long as their supposedly divine right to exploit the American people is not disturbed.

They have sworn to destroy President Roosevelt not because President Roosevelt is a Democrat; not because he is Franklin D. Roosevelt; simply because they hate and dread the things he stands for.

They would rather have the poorhouses any day—for someone else—than a decent system of social security.

They would rather have bread lines on every corner—for their victims, of course—than permit decent legislation which would protect the man who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow.

They would rather have American citizens starve—and before President Roosevelt stepped into the White House they did let them starve—than have the Budget unbalanced to pay the bill for relief.

These are the people who talk about the Constitution. I tell you American people cannot eat the Constitution. They cannot clothe or shelter themselves with the Constitution. People are not interested in legal technicalities. They are concerned with the intent and purpose of the Constitution—to promote the general welfare. That is why the Constitution was established. That is the end it was written to achieve and must achieve if it is to be a living charter of liberty.

The very people who attempt to hide their greed, their lust for money and for power behind the cloak of the Constitution are doing more than anyone else to destroy it.

America entered upon a new era with the rise of Jacksonian democracy, just as it is today under the leadership of President Roosevelt. Before Jackson the Tories of his day had been in the saddle. They held the great masses of the people in contempt, and operated the American Government as they would an exclusive club. Andrew Jackson swept all of that away, as he had swept away the British before him at the Battle of New Orleans. He went forth as the people's champion, fighting their battle against the truthless money power that was squeezing the lifeblood from the young nation. He fought for the farmers, the mechanics, and laborers, who had neither the time nor the means to secure special favors for themselves from their Government.

He believed in the sovereign rights of the States, but apart from and above that was his deep and abiding devotion to the Federal Union. When the rich planters of South Carolina tried to nullify the Federal tariff law—as some interests today are trying to nullify other Federal laws—he gave them their answer in the challenging toast that he flung in the face of Calhoun: "Our Federal Union—it must and shall be preserved."

President Roosevelt is giving the same answer today to the would-be autocrats who are attempting to set up a monopoly of power over the people of the United States. Men of wealth are carping today about Federal expenditures. Why? Because that money is going to the hungry and shelterless, to the needy and underprivileged—instead of into their own pockets, as it always had in the past. That money represents the shocking price that America has had to pay for years of heartless exploitation of her people.

You will find no mention of that simple fact in the flood of printer's ink that pours from the luxurious offices of the Liberty Leaguers and their friends. Do they mention the fourteen billions of American dollars—your dollars—that they sent over to Europe and down to South America, never to return? Do they mention the eighty billions of inflated 1929 valuation that withered away? Do they mention the billions spent by Herbert Hoover to bring back prosperity by lining the pockets of the rich and by bolstering the shaky structures built up by the financial and industrial barons? Of course they don't. They would like to have America forget. They would like to have the mantle of oblivion dropped charitably over those tragic years from Harding to Hoover.

There is only one answer that America can and must make—"This Nation is not for sale."

Our people must not be sold back into economic slavery. Against the power of millions of dollars we must marshal the rights of millions of our people. We have had enough of the rugged individualism of Charlie Mitchell and Sam Insull.

Everyone who has given the matter a second thought knows why Wall Street and Big Business hate President Roosevelt. He has taken away the fat profits of exploitation. He has thrown a bright light into the dark corners of business morality. He has exposed the crooked and unscrupulous financial gamblers who preyed upon the American public.

In the old days, the golden days just before the bubble burst, Wall Street dictated the financial and foreign policy of the United States from New York. Those were the days of Andrew Mellon, the only Secretary of the Treasury under whom three Presidents served.

Can it be that the well-fed men in exclusive clubs are disappointed because President Roosevelt has not consulted them, as Hoover did?

Can it be that their pride is hurt? Or is it merely the pocketbook nerve that twinges when they see relief funds going to save the unfortunate unemployed from starvation?

Whatever the reason may be, there can be no doubt that their ingratitude would be amazing if we did not know them so well. We all remember how they ran to President Roosevelt like so many frightened children when their house of cards came tumbling down. We remember their pathetic pleas for help. They were penitent and humble in those days.

They cheered when President Roosevelt launched his recovery program. They applauded when his strong hand reorganized a ruined banking structure, when he restored the faith and confidence of the multitudes.

Those policies, carried out through the agencies of the New Deal, have brought real and substantial recovery to our Nation. They have also established principles which cannot be abandoned, no matter what party comes into power. Guaranties for labor as established in the National Recovery Administration, the farm adjustment of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, the real-estate protection of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation, the bank-deposit insurance of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation—all these are today a part of the American system and will be for years to come, no matter how many agencies set up to make those policies effective are ruled out by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The attacks of the Tories of today upon our fundamental principles of government are a serious threat to our institutions, and yet recent developments lead me to believe there is another greater threat.

I do not think Democracy has much to fear in these days from the Liberty Leaguers. I believe it has much more reason to be concerned by the attitude of some members of the United States Supreme Court. I say this advisedly. When the Supreme Court ruled that the National Recovery Act was unconstitutional we liberals felt the decision was a tragic blow to labor and industry. Now a majority of the Supreme Court has ruled that the Agricultural Adjustment Administration is unconstitutional.

Yet we find three Justices dissenting, which means that the nature of the decision apparently depended upon the economic and political convictions of the individual Justices, rather than upon any hard and fast abstractions of the law. If there had been two more Justices holding the same views as Justices Stone, Brandeis, and Cardozo, the Agricultural Adjustment Administration would have been ruled constitutional. It therefore is demonstrated that the constitutionality of any Federal legislation rests upon the uncertain basis of private opinions held by a few men.

The vote was 6 to 3 against. If only two men had changed, it would have been 5 to 4 in favor. The result is that we find the opinions of two men, who are mortal and fallible just as the rest of us, thwarting the expressed will of the executive branch of our Government, as exemplified by the President, and the expressed will of the legislative branch of our Government, the Congress of the United States.

From the brilliant and historic dissenting opinion of Justice Stone we learn that the right of Congress to levy a processing tax was not questioned by the Court. Nor was there any question of the right of Congress to spend the tax revenues to promote the general welfare. The Court held instead that in its opinion the use of the processing taxes for the purposes specified by Congress was unwise.

Justice Stone most appropriately pointed out that the courts are concerned only with the power of Congress to enact statutes, not with their wisdom. All of us agree with him that "for the removal of unwise laws from the statute books appeal lies not to the courts, but to the ballot and the processes of democratic government."

In its majority decision the Court asserts the right to declare statutes unconstitutional simply because the Court believes them unwise, and not because of any constitutional limitation. We can view this only as establishing a precedent for control of the entire Government by the Supreme Court, without regard for the Constitution.

I cannot subscribe to that belief. I believe, with Justices Stone, Brandeis, and Cardozo, that within the limits of the Constitution the people themselves are the sole judges of the wisdom of their legislation.

With due respect for the dignity of the Supreme Court, we cannot stand by idly and see our entire system of democracy thrown into chaos without a word of protest. Personally, I cannot, and will not, remain silent while the Supreme Court dismembers our Federal Union.

I use the word "dismember" in all sincerity. The decision of the Court in the N. I. R. A. case drastically limited the powers of the Federal Government. The more recent decision virtually destroys that Government and sets up a loose federation of 48 separate countries. It requires each State to legislate for the handling of its own problems. Pennsylvania, for instance, if it enacts laws to protect labor, must meet the competition of a State such as Delaware, which is controlled by the Du Ponts, the angels of the Liberty League, and the bitter foes of labor.

The Supreme Court grants Pennsylvania its "freedom" to pass labor laws. Yet the Supreme Court will not permit Pennsylvania to interfere with interstate commerce by keeping out sweatshop products from other States. What does that mean? Simply that Pennsylvania is not permitted to protect the interests of its own people by excluding from its trade those commodities made in Delaware. With the one hand the Supreme Court grants Pennsylvania sovereignty—with the other it takes it away.

The majority decision of the Supreme Court is a challenge to democracy. How that challenge is to be met remains to be seen, but it is most important that the full implication of that decision be brought home to all the people of America. While the Tories gloat over the fact that another recovery measure has been obliterated, we must look beyond the immediate results and consider the future of our democratic Government. In all our history it has never been in more danger than it is today.

In his own day, Old Hickory annihilated the forces of reaction and special privilege which threatened the liberties of the American people. Today F. D. R. faces the same sinister enemies, faces them with undaunted courage, the same unflinching will to win through.

My reason, my heart tells me that F. D. R., the Andy Jackson of our own day, fighting the battle of the American citizen, will smash through to epoch-making achievement and glorious victory.

ADDRESS OF POSTMASTER GENERAL FARLEY

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an address made by the Postmaster General in my county of Westchester on January 13.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the address of Postmaster General James A. Farley, Democratic national and State chairman, over station WOR, New York City, the Yankee network of 11 New England stations, and CKLW, Detroit-Windsor, Monday evening, January 13, 1936, at the dinner of the Westchester County Democratic committee, Murray's Bronx River Parkway, Tuckahoe, N. Y., as follows:

This deferred celebration of Jackson Day by the Democracy of Westchester County augments the host of other celebrations which occurred on the 8th of January, when thousands of champions of real American liberty gathered in their communities to listen to the President's clear, precise, and eloquent definition of what is the real issue of the national campaign already under way.

I am glad that circumstances made it necessary for you to hold your celebration tonight, because it gives me the opportunity of being present and at the same time has made it possible for the message which I bring to you to be heard on the air over a number of radio stations, for whose cooperation I am extremely grateful.

I might say that I am grateful also to the radio industry as a whole, because it has become evident that the broadcasting systems have fully sensed their responsibility to the public at large and intend to give freely and impartially of their facilities to both sides, so that listeners will be fully informed of every phase of the issues on which will rest the outcome of November's crucial election. I congratulate these great broadcasting systems on their fair-mindedness and their freedom from domination, and along with them I congratulate that portion of the public press which senses the fact that they owe their readers an uncolored presentation of the news. That portion of the press like the radio broadcasters know that the twin right of the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press, constitutionally guaranteed in this country, carries with it the responsibility to present the news of the day without discoloring it by omissions, deceiving headlines, or artful insertion of language to distort the truth.

In the statement that I have just made I fully realize that I have singled out certain newspapers and have accused them of being dominated by the interests which seek to undermine every structure of the Government that has been set up to protect the rights and liberty of its citizens. I wish time would permit me to call these newspapers by name and to show unmistakably the extent of their interests and to prove to you that instead of being the champions of liberty, which they profess to be, that they are either themselves a vast industry seeking special privileges or that they are controlled by that selfish group of industrialists and financiers who were the first to run to cover in 1929, and who now wish to profit from the prosperity of progress by getting into the game with the dice loaded in their favor.

Happily in this great country of ours the self-professed gangsters of big business constitute only a small minority of the people engaged in finance and industry. Unhappily, because they operated under the special privileges in vogue under the Republican regime of the twenties, they were able to get out from under before the crash, and they are still in possession of practically all of the material power which they built up when the public at large was holding the bag and these United States were governed by a small coterie of unprincipled brigands ensconced in luxurious offices in the skyscrapers of Manhattan, Pittsburgh, and Chicago.

Those were the days when you heard little about the Government of the United States and much about the House of Morgan, the Du Pont dynasty, the Insull empire, and the Mellon merry-go-round. Those were the days when the foodstuffs of the Nation were the pawns of speculation, when the securities of the Nation were watered so heavily that they finally sank, swamped by the very weight of their waterlogged structures. Those were the days when the banks of a nation were changed from depositories for the protection of the peoples' savings into the mediums by which the peoples' wealth could be transferred into the coffers of the greedy and the people themselves left bankrupt.

These are the ones who today are crying that they can solve the problem of unemployment, which is the legacy of Hoover misgovernment. They in these very claims show their hypocrisy. If they can perform the miracle of bringing about the much-desired economic balance, why did they not do it in 1930, 1931, and 1932, when they were in control of the Government? If they have the solution of the problem now, why do they not operate it immediately or make known their plan so that the people can understand it? I challenge them to do so; but I know full well there will be no answer, for the simple reason that they are still in the same haze that they were in the days of the crash of their own making. Their stock in trade is talk. They have no plan. They are obstructionists bent only on destruction, and in their stupidity they are blind to the gains that have been made by logical government, gains which have benefited not only all our people but also these very moguls of commerce who now are turning on the Government which saved them when they could not save themselves. Instead of being grateful, they have become the die-hards who would wreck their rescuers, and unless they can have the lion's share they would drag to ruin a great structure built, not to benefit any one class but all classes. If anyone is guilty of setting class against class, they are, and their cry is wholly in the interest of that small class which knows not the meaning of the words "sportmanship, gratitude, and patriotism."

We in this State can thank God that we have a business man for Governor; one whose successful business career has not warped his conscience. There has been no better picture drawn of the situation which confronted the present administration at its outset than the one given at the Jackson Day dinner in New York last Wednesday night by Herbert H. Lehman. For economy of time, I quote him with omissions.

In part, Governor Lehman said:

"I come here as a former business man for the purpose of laying before you * * * facts with regard to the recent economic crises * * * and our recovery from it.

"None of us will readily forget the situation in this country at the beginning of 1933.

"We cannot forget the critical run on the banks * * * the situations of our great life insurance companies * * * the thousands upon thousands of people out of employment and in need * * * the position of manufacturers and merchants * * * forced either to shut down or substantially to reduce their working forces.

"Corporation after corporation showed deficits instead of the usual profits.

"It looked as if the entire railroad system of the country inevitably would rapidly move into receivership.

"Home owners and property owners in larger and larger numbers were being foreclosed and dispossessed. The situation of agriculture was desperate. Prices were so low that the farmer could not get back even the money he had put into the production of commodities.

"New York City and many of the other large cities * * * were powerless to finance even their current needs.

"No honest person can deny the existence of almost complete economic paralysis. The country was sick well nigh unto death and our people were without hope.

"If we were to survive * * * it was necessary to replace distrust, suspicion, fear, and panic with a spirit of hopefulness and a deep determination to fight on. New leadership * * * that would rally the fighting qualities of the American people, was needed. That was the situation on March 4, 1933, when into the office of the President of the United States stepped Franklin D. Roosevelt."

Governor Lehman's picture is underdrawn rather than overdrawn. It was at that time that those who now would "gang-up" on the Government were hoarding their gold, hiding through fear in the inner recesses of their well-stocked castles, or fleeing from our shores like rats from a sinking ship. This small group, running true to form, now brazenly have assum 1 the language as well as the methods of the racketeers.

During Governor Lehman's crime conference the methods of the organized gangsters were vividly brought out. In their mad scramble for wealth and power they adopt for their own protection the strategy of penetration. Through the free use of money they penetrated into the offices of respectable lawyers, of holders of public office, of weak leaders of political groups, some labor unions, some newspapers, and some businessmen. They buy protection with wealth and use it for further increasing their devilish power. They organize paper associations with high-sounding names and, if possible, put at the head of them spokesmen who are paid well to front for the power behind the throne. These ordinary gangsters have proven that, human nature being as it is, there are plenty who would submerge their convictions for a price.

How little did the roughnecks of the alleys ever think that their practices would be emulated by men already powerful and rich but lustful for more power and more wealth. Yet such has been the case. There are those who would gang up on the Government. What government would they gang up on? The present Government of the United States, which, in the words of Governor Lehman, that I will again quote, has changed the discouraging picture of 1933 to this picture that he draws of the present:

"Three years have passed since March 1933 * * * progress, real progress, has been made all along the line. The record speaks for itself.

"Our financial institutions are happily stronger than ever.

"Deposits have grown each year since 1933. Our insurance companies are today as strong as ever in their history. Manufacturers and merchants are in the main making money, and the outlook is promising.

"Electric power consumption * * * is now at its all-time high.

"Wool consumption * * * is at an all-time high.

"Production and sales of automobiles throughout the year 1935 not only surpasses all the depression years but in many instances former records of 1928 and 1929.

"Crude oil production is now in the highest point since 1929.

"The production of shoes is today at the highest for all time.

"Copper * * * is now at its highest point since 1931.

"Our railroad companies * * * are showing profits instead of deficits.

"The New York Times Business Index rose from 63 in March 1933 to 96 in November 1935.

"The position of agriculture has completely changed since 1932. Farm cash income for October is placed at $851,000,000, the highest * * * since 1929.

"There was not a single failure on the New York Stock Exchange during the entire year of 1935. The market average of listed securities is 30 percent higher than a year ago.

"The pages of every newspaper * * * show improvement. No one who lived through 1932 and the first half of 1933 can possibly doubt that the situation today is entirely different from what it was in those terrible days."

In the face of the above facts, which I have quoted in the very words of a man who has your confidence and who himself is recognized as a great banker and a great businessman, isn't it a sad commentary on the intelligence of some other business leaders that they in their stupidity would wish to cripple a Government which has saved them in their hour of need. It is worthy of note that they only attack those New Deal enactments which do not directly benefit themselves. They have the means to attack through the courts, laws that were formulated to make them play the game on the level, and every one of these laws that has been set up to give the average man and woman a chance to better their conditions have been fought to the last ditch by the few who have not the courage to enter the arena of commerce under rules that insure a fair deal to all. Look over the list of laws that they have attacked and you will find that every enactment made for the protection of the little man and the medium-class man and the honest and patriotic-minded businessman has been attacked from scores of sources.

Why do they not attack the legislation which benefited them directly? They do not because they are perfectly willing to be on the receiving end. They are too stupid to see that pending the solution of unemployment it is necessary by means of public works to provide employment, which in turn safeguards and raises the values by which they rate their wealth. Despite the fact that the security markets have again regained the confidence of the investors by reason of the S. E. C., they are too stupid to see that this great enactment, set up for the protection of all, has benefited them by increasing the wealth of the Nation in terms of security values. But their stupidity is not to be wondered at in the light of the history of their wild speculation in the twenties and in the light of their brazen call to all of their ilk to "gang-up" on the Government.

The attempt of these arrant demagogues and the hirelings of the privileged element, which, under Roosevelt's New Deal faces the certainty of having their special favors taken away, to make it appear that the reforms being adopted are destructive of American institutions, is having hard going.

Their favorite sophistry is that Roosevelt is working for socialism, the more shameless or the most ignorant insist for communism, and now and then someone like Mr. Hoover thinks it is for fascism. The notorious truth is that fascism in America has had its sole support among the short-sighted big businessmen who associate fascism with the denial to workers of the right of collective bargaining.

And the truth is, as the more enlightened and intelligent among the big-business group well know, that in the collapse of the privileged system in the dying days of the old deal under Mr. Hoover we were in dire danger of a social revolution which brought us perilously near the utter destruction of American institutions.

Millions on the farms had been driven to desperation, until in some sections the most naturally conservative and law-abiding of our citizens were terrorizing courts and dragging judges from the bench.

Millions in industrial centers were jobless and penniless, and because of the apathy of the Government and the cold indifference of the very rich many of these were in despair and hopeless of the future under the American system. Had they not been told when they begged for work or bread from their Government that charity was the "American way"?

The great middle class was being slowly but surely exterminated, and these had their faith in the American system seriously shaken.

He who did not realize in the summer of 1932 that we were on the verge of a grave social upheaval that might easily take the form of a revolution was living in a fool's paradise.

But not all representatives of big business and big money were living in this fool's paradise; they knew.

They knew the danger, but because of their training, environment, and lack of initiative and constructive capacity, they did not know what to do. Some of them were trying to get their money out of the country to save themselves.

And then came Roosevelt, who had an idea what to do, and who had the courage to do it.

In the beginning he was hailed even by the privileged crowd as a savior. There was no criticism. They were willing to be saved, even by him.

But in the beginning they thought he merely proposed to cover the leakage of the roof with a smear of mud; to tinker a bit with the machine to make it serve a little longer until it would collapse again.

They did not have vision or intelligence enough to know that such patching would make another collapse inevitable, nor imagination enough to realize that another collapse would certainly be the ruin of American institutions.

And when they found that Roosevelt was going to the heart of the trouble, was going to rid organized society of the system and the methods that led unerringly to the collapse, they became alarmed.

It was the privileges of this small favored class that brought the collapse of 1929; but the moment Roosevelt's revival of a little confidence gave them a breathing spell, they deliberately concluded that they should rally for the perpetuation of the social and industrial and financial wrongs that had wrought the ruin.

Now, all great social or political upheavals, such as those in France during the last days of the eighteenth century and in Russia in the early days of the twentieth century, have come from the wrongs afflicted on the average man by a privileged system. Privilege is the golden path to revolution.

And Roosevelt proposes to make a clean workmanlike job of reform; and because he knows that only through reforms that end the exploitation of the many by the few can American institutions be preserved.

He knows that since every element has suffered from the wrongs, the reforms must touch every element in the Nation, the farmer, the industrial worker, the miner, the toiler incapacitated by age, the small-business man, the professional man, the white-collar worker.

That is what is making his administration one of the most significant and stupendous in all history.

In the light of the progress that has been made, the destiny of this country rests upon the continued war that has been made in the interest of the people of this country. This war started as a war against depression. The war against depression has been won, but the forces which have so successfully attained this victory cannot yet be demobilized, because we are faced with another enemy, an enemy who would snatch the fruits of our victory and use them to undermine again the foundations on which we are striving to build a permanent prosperity. These are the ones who would "gang-up" on the Government.

There is only one answer: "Keep Roosevelt in, and keep the gang out."

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1937

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9863) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1937, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate may be continued throughout the day, the time to be equally divided between myself and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH], and in this connection, Mr. Speaker, I may say that it is the purpose of the committee, after consulting with the minority, to close all debate today, with the exception of my speech and the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts, explaining the bill, after which we shall hope to proceed to read the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to make the statement that it was our expectation and hope to be able to take up another appropriation bill this week, but I understand from the gentleman from Virginia and other members of the committee that this will be the only appropriation bill it will be possible to consider this week.

Mr. WOODRUM. It is our hope that after having had such liberal debate on the bill we can read it with dispatch and finish its consideration early Friday, at which time, I understand, it is expected the House will adjourn over.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BOLAND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I am presenting a resolution to the House today for the investigation of the Communications Commission, and I ask unanimous consent that this resolution may be read for the information of Members.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution to appoint a select committee to investigate the charges of irregularities in the granting and renewals of radio licenses, the broadcasting of alleged obscene and indecent utterances by radio stations, the charges of alleged monopolies, and to investigate and report on charges made or which may be made as to charges of alleged misconduct and alleged corruption on the part of certain persons officially connected with said Commission, and to investigate the acts and activities of said Commission

Whereas on April 5, 1935, 16 Members of the House of Representatives, whose attention having been directed to a broadcast over the N. B. C. network, which broadcast contained alleged obscene and indecent utterances, and which program was in the interest of and paid for by a foreign government, filed with the Federal Communications Commission a protest against such programs and, in addition, petitioned said Federal Communications Commission for an immediate investigation of the charges contained in said protest, and, further, requested a public hearing on the results of such investigation; and

Whereas the Federal Communications Commission, in reply to said petition, stated that an investigation was being made; and

Whereas the Federal Communications Commission later replied to the petitioners setting forth that said program was not obscene within the rule laid down in a court decision cited by said Commission, which citation quoted language which is not to be found in the specific decision cited; and

Whereas the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 31, 1935, contains a full and factual history of this failure on the part of the Federal Communications Commission to properly enforce the Communications Act of 1934, and in addition contains excerpts from affidavits which alleged that competent officials of the said N. B. C. admitted that the program complained of contained obscene and indecent utterances; and

Whereas the Chairman of the said Federal Communications Commission, in testifying before the House Appropriations Committee, admitted that the property of the Government, namely, radio broadcasting licenses or franchises, were the subject of profiteering on the part of individuals and others; and

Whereas charges have been made that certain vested interests are alleged to be receiving large sums of money due to the leasing to others of licenses or franchises issued by said Federal Communications Commission; and

Whereas it is well known that a monopoly exists wherein a few control all of the valuable franchises or licenses issued by said Commission, while educational, labor, religious, and other nonprofit-making organizations are denied opportunities of securing favorable consideration for radio broadcasting facilities from said Federal Communications Commission; and

Whereas the said Commission, as a result of charges apparently placed before it by the Chairman of said Commission, has now created a committee of five of its seven members to investigate charges of alleged misconduct and alleged corruption on the part of certain persons officially connected with the said Commission; and

Whereas it is in the public interest that a thorough and exhaustive investigation be made of these and other alleged irregularities: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five Members of the House of Representatives shall be appointed by the Speaker, which committee is hereby authorized and directed to inquire into and investigate the allegations and charges that have been or may be made relative to irregularities in the granting and renewal of licenses and other matters coming within the jurisdiction of the Federal Communications Commission or pertaining in whole or in part to the functions of the said Federal Communications Commission; be it further

Resolved, That the said committee shall make a thorough and exhaustive investigation of all allegations and charges that have been or may be made in connection with any and all matters pertaining to the Federal Communications Commission and shall report in whole or in part at any time to the House of Representatives, together with such recommendations as it deems advisable; and be it further

Resolved, That for the purpose of this resolution the said committee is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act during the sessions and the recesses of the present Congress at such time and places, either in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, and to employ such expert clerical and stenographic services as may be found necessary, and to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of witnesses, to administer oaths, to compel the production of books, papers, and documents by Government or private agencies, and to take and record such testimony as the committee may deem advisable or necessary to the proper conduct of the investigation directed by this resolution.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert a factual history of the elimination of Mexican radio programs described as obscene and indecent paid for by the Mexican Government.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FACTUAL HISTORY OF THE ELIMINATION OF MEXICAN RADIO PROGRAM DESCRIBED AS OBSCENE AND INDECENT PAID FOR BY THE MEXICAN GOVERNMENT—SERIES POURED WEEKLY INTO AMERICAN HOMES BY THE NATIONAL BROADCASTING CO.

AN INDICATION OF THE POWER AND INFLUENCE OF THE RADIO TRUST AND THE UNWILLINGNESS OR THE INABILITY OF A GOVERNMENTAL AGENCY TO PROTECT AMERICAN HOMES FROM FILTHY RADIO PROGRAMS AND ALIEN PROPAGANDA—HAS THE SERVANT BECOME THE MASTER?

JULY 1, 1935.

The Honorable CORDELL HULL,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.
(Attention R. Walton Moore, Assistant Secretary.)

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Complying with your request enclosed herein, you will find a factual history, with copies of correspondence, which is self-explanatory, indicating the unwillingness or the inability of the Federal Communications Commission to force the National Broadcasting Co. to comply with the provisions of the Communications Act of 1934 or to prosecute the Mexican Government for its open and flagrant violation of the provisions of that act.

The protest and request which 16 Members of the House of Representatives, including the undersigned, made to the Federal Communications Commission pertaining to an obscene, filthy, and vile radio broadcast originating in the New York studios of the National Broadcasting Co. and broadcast over a network of radio stations, which broadcast was put on by or for the Mexican Government and paid for by that Government, has been virtually ignored by the Federal Communications Commission.

The Federal Communications Commission has, either in a futile effort to protect the Mexican Government or the officials of the National Broadcasting Co., or both, from proper prosecution for this openly flagrant violation of the Communications Act of 1934, which act specifically provides: "Section 327. * * * No person within the jurisdiction of the United States shall utter any obscene, indecent, or profane language by means of radio communication", revealed their impotency or their subserviency to either those in control of the National Broadcasting Co. or the Mexican Government.

Further, the penalty for such violations, as provided for in the Communications Act of 1934, is as follows: "Section 501. Any person who willfully and knowingly does or causes or suffers to be done any act, matter, or thing in this act prohibited or declared unlawful, or who willfully and knowingly omits or fails to do any act, matter, or thing in this act required to be done, or willfully and knowingly causes or suffers such omission or failure, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished for such offense, for which no penalty (other than forfeiture) is provided herein, by fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for a term of not more than 2 years, or both."

The Federal Communications Commission, either as a result of only a casual investigation, if any investigation was really made, or, in an attempt to deceive those who had, in writing, asked for an investigation, either failed to secure or ignored the results of the investigation made by officials of the National Broadcasting Co. is revealed in part in affidavits, the substantial contents of which, with names temporarily deleted, are herein quoted:

(1) "The undersigned testifies that on the program broadcasted on Thursday, March 21, at the WJZ Station at 9:30 p. m., under the title of 'Mexican Program', there was a recitative, with music, which we qualify unfitted for the radio. It was an account of the love affairs of a man with several girls, and then told of the exquisite of those love affairs with the girl he loved, and spoke of their songs, their kisses, at the shore of the lake, and finally, when the girl disrobed herself and offered him her beauty, which he began to describe in an indecent way."

(2) "I further state that * * * stated that his investigation disclosed the fact that the second number of this program was a poem, recited in Spanish and backgrounded with music; that the narrator reached into his vest pocket, withdrew a sheet of paper, and recited in Spanish a poem which was entirely different from that rendered or used in the rehearsal, and also in the regular dress rehearsal held immediately prior to the actual broadcast; that the program had not been recorded; and that in order to find out what was actually broadcasted * * * was obliged to call into his office for separate examination, first, the narrator who recited the poem, and, secondly, the leader of the orchestra, who was also present at the time in the studio, and that in each instance he had them give their individual version and report of what had been transmitted 'over the air.'"

"I further state that * * * also stated that as a result of the individual reports which he received from the narrator and the orchestra leader, and on account of the indecent, obscene, and suggestive remarks contained in the poem, he was recommending on that same day * * * that the contract entered into with, and paid for in advance by, the Mexican Government should be canceled immediately."

"I further state that * * * also stated that his investigation of the other songs and poems, used in the first and also the second broadcasts of this series for the Mexican Government were also suggestive, but not as openly obscene as the second number, or poem, of the first broadcast, and that all of these old thirteenth century Spanish and Arabic songs and poems seemed to 'convey suggestive meanings', as he expressed it, and were not, in his opinion, in line with good taste and 'public interest.'"

(3) "* * * we conferred with * * * officials of the National Broadcasting Co.

"I further state that the said * * * stated that 'with all due respect to the Catholic Church, should he be requested to rebroadcast the Mexican Government program of March 21, 1935, he would not hesitate to approve the request.'"

"I further state that the said * * * stated that 'all of the programs of the National Broadcasting Co. sent out over their networks were recorded, and that this also included the Mexican Government program of March 21, 1935.'"

You will note that one official of the National Broadcasting Co., in the presence of other officials of the National Broadcasting Co., states to those they had invited to the offices of the National Broadcasting Co. to discuss the results of the investigation which the National Broadcasting Co. itself had made of the charges of obscenity contained in the program broadcasted for or by the Mexican Government on March 21, admitted that "on account of the indecent, obscene, and suggestive remarks contained in the poem he was recommending on that same day * * * that the contract entered into with and paid for in advance by the Mexican Government should be canceled immediately." Also you will note that the same official recounted how he had to call in different individuals in order to secure a definite picture of what had occurred, while another official stated that the program was recorded.

Exhibit no. 1. Copy of my letter to Hon. Anning S. Prall, Chairman, Federal Communications Commission, under date of April 1, 1935.

Exhibit no. 2. Copy of reply from Hon. Anning S. Prall, under date of April 2, 1935, to my letter of April 1, 1935.

Exhibit no. 3. Copy of translation and original Spanish text furnished to me by the Federal Communications Commission. Also copy of translation made for me by an authority on and one familiar with the Mexican language. The translation furnished to me by the Communications Commission, incomplete in itself, also seeks to hide or "clothe" the indecency which, I understand, a true translation reveals.

Exhibit no. 4. Copy of petition, signed by 16 members of the House of Representatives, sent to the Federal Communications Commission on April 15, 1935.

Exhibit no. 5. Copy of letter of April 30, acknowledging receipt of the petition above referred to and stating that "a full and complete investigation is being made of the subject matter * * *."

Exhibit no. 6. Copy of my letter of May 11 to Hon. Anning S. Prall, Chairman, Federal Communications Commission.

Exhibit no. 7. Clipping from, or marked page of, the May 1, 1935, issue of Broadcasting, a radio magazine, the editors of which, according to statement made by Rev. Joseph F. Thorning, S. J., in the presence of Commissioners Prall, Sykes, and Case (see exhibit no. 8), are credited with being quite intimate with the Chairman and other members of the Broadcast Division of the Federal Communications Commission.

You will note that this news story indicates—to those engaged in operating radio broadcasting station—that the Communications Commission had already, before May 1, 1935, completed such investigation as they had made and had arrived at a decision.

Exhibit no. 8. Quotations taken from the address delivered by Rev. Joseph F. Thorning, S. J., at public hearing, held by the Broadcast Division of the Federal Communications Commission May 16, 1935, at which were present Commissioners Prall, Sykes, and Case, and which statement includes contents of letters sent to me by Chairman Prall on May 14, 1935.

You will note that no refutation was made at this or any other time of the accuracy or inaccuracy of the contents of the news story of May 1, 1935, or the letter of May 14, 1935, which letter stated very specifically that the investigation had not been concluded or a decision arrived at.

Exhibit no. 9. Copy of letter of May 27, wherein the Federal Communications Commission, "after careful study," finds that the program complained of was not obscene under a ruling made in 1883 before radio broadcasting had been called to the attention of Congress.

The letter of May 27, referred to as exhibit no. 9, specifically cites a ruling made in the case of Duncan v. United States, decided in 1931, and supposedly cites language to be found in the decision of the court in that case. Incidentally this case, Duncan v. United States, dealt with a violation of the Radio or Communications Act, and was brought as a result of an indictment returned for a violation of the radio laws. The rulings of the court are very appropo of the program which the Mexican Government put on or had broadcasted from the New York studios of the National Broadcasting Co. on March 21.

In looking through the findings of the court in the case, Duncan v. United States, specifically cited, we note that the language, such as is quoted in the letter of May 27, was very much different than that found in the court's findings.

However, it is worth noting that in the case cited by the Federal Communications Commission, Duncan v. United States, the court held:

"The test is as to whether or not the language alleged to be obscene would arouse lewd or lascivious thought in the minds of those hearing or reading the publication.

"In construing the word 'obscene' as used therein, it has been uniformly held that, if the matter complained of were of such a nature as would tend to corrupt the morals of those whose minds are open to such influences by arousing or implanting in such minds lewd or lascivious thoughts or desires, it is within the prohibition of the statute, and that whether or not it had such a tendency was a question for the jury."

Exhibit no. 10. Copy of letter from the Federal Communications Commission of June 6 attempting to correct the obvious deception contained in their letter of May 27. The citation they refer to in this letter of June 6, in an attempt to justify their findings contained in their letter of May 27, is found in cases dealing with violations of the postal laws and handed down in 1883, many years before radio broadcasting was seriously thought of.

Other affidavits similar to those quoted from are available and substantiate the contention that the program which we complained of, broadcasted by or for the Mexican Government, over the network of the National Broadcasting Co., was obscene.

Trusting that the enclosed is in the form and is the type of material you requested and that we will be favored with action and an early decision on the part of the State Department.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr.

I trust that you will comply with this request, and that the matter herein requested will be furnished me within the next day or two.

(In part only)

Greetings to Silves, friend,
And ask her if she has
Memory of my love
In her sweet abode.

Oh, how many nights I passed there
Beside a girl
Of well-shaped and graceful form,
Of firm and wide thighs!

Oh, how many women wounded
My soul there with loves!
Like sharp arrows were
Their sweet glances.

Oh, how many nights also
I passed by the side of the water
With the lovely singer
In the solitary meadow!

Then was she wont to sing to me
Between kisses
Some warlike song
To the sound of my guitar;
And my heart then
Shook with ardor
As in battle is heard
The shock of arms.

But, my greatest delight
Was when she stood naked
Of her flowing garments;
And, like a bending branch
Of a willow, uncovered to me
Her beauty, an unfolding rose
Which breaks its bud
And displays all its loveliness.

Hon. ANNING S. PRALL,
Chairman, Federal Communications Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN PRALL: Your recent radio address indicating the Federal Communications Commission, under your leadership, would protect the American home from radio broadcasts of an obscene, unclean, and offensive nature meets with the unqualified approval of every self-respecting American.

Last week your attention was called to the broadcasting of a radio program by the Mexican Government which is described in the April 8 issue of America as a "filthy piece of unabashed pornography."

Assuming that your recent radio declaration will be carried out, we feel quite positive that program as described in such a reliable and responsible publication as America comes within the category of your declaration.

Believing that it is the intent of your Commission to treat all radio broadcasters alike, without granting undue favors to the National Broadcasting Co., we, members of the House of Representatives, respectfully suggest that your Commission indicate the sincerity of its purpose by penalizing those radio stations which violated the rules of your Commission, and offended the hospitality extended to radio by the American home, in broadcasting a program that can be described as "a filthy piece of unabashed pornography" by the cancelation of the broadcasting licenses of these radio stations or, at least, by immediately suspending the licenses of those stations until a thorough investigation can be made by your Commission and a public hearing held.

Trusting that your Commission will immediately take action upon this request and notify the undersigned of your action.

Respectfully submitted.

Hon. WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr., M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN CONNERY: The receipt is acknowledged of your letter of April 16, 1935, with which you transmit a petition signed, jointly, by 16 Members of Congress, and with which you also transmit a page from the magazine America, dated April 6, 1935. All of these concern a complaint against the action of station WJZ in broadcasting an allegedly offensive song during a program which was sponsored by the Government of Mexico.

In reply thereto you are advised that a full and complete investigation is being made of the subject matter of your complaint, and upon the completion of the investigation such action will be taken in the premises as is appropriate under the law.

Very sincerely yours,

ANNING S. PRALL, Chairman.

Hon. ANNING S. PRALL,
Chairman, Federal Communications Commission,
Post Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CHAIRMAN PRALL: Your letter of April 30, which acknowledged my letter of April 16 enclosing petition of myself and 15 other Members of the House of Representatives, contained the information that your Commission had instituted an investigation of the program broadcasted over the National Broadcasting Co. network by the Mexican Government on March 21.

In view of the fact that this obscene program was called to your attention on March 25, I am assuming that your Commission has, by this time, ascertained the accuracy of the charges contained in the petition filed by myself and 15 other Members of the House of Representatives, as well as those protests which we have since learned were filed by many individuals.

Our petition not alone directed your attention to this obscene program but, in addition thereto, requested the cancelation or suspension of the licenses of those radio broadcasting stations which carried this obscene program, and also a public hearing to discuss the findings of your Commission.

As several of those who are vitally interested in this matter will meet in Washington on Wednesday, May 15, I trust I am not asking too much when I request that you favor me, prior to that time, with some definite statement as to the results of your investigation, the action of the Federal Communications Commission on our request for the cancelation or suspension of the licenses of those radio stations which broadcasted this obscene program and the date your Commission has set for a public hearing, as we requested.

Trusting that I may be favored with the information requested and with every good wish,

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr.

"PROTESTS AGAINST SERIES BY MEXICAN GOVERNMENT ARE REJECTED BY F. C. C.

"Finding nothing improper or in violation of the radio regulations, the F. C. C. has passed over the protest registered by a group of Congressmen against the program sponsored over an NBC-WEAF network by the Mexican Government and designed to stimulate tourist travel, it was learned April 25. The protest asked for punitive action against NBC on the ground that the initial program, broadcast March 21, contained a poem in Spanish, which allegedly was offensive to Catholics. In addition to the protest signed by 16 Congressmen, Father John B. Harney, Superior to the Paulist Fathers, New York, also asked for disciplinary action."

Excerpts taken from address of Rev. Joseph F. Thorning, S. J., at hearings before Broadcast Division of Federal Communications Commission, on May 16, 1935:

"We do not know whether or not this same publication, Broadcasting, the editors of which, we understand, have entries to and are presumed to have a rather intimate relationship with, members of this Commission, were justified in their comments and their advice of May 1 to the radio industry, but we do know that there has been no repudiation on the part of this Commission of this rather unusual prophesy as to the attitude of this Commission. And if there is any formal repudiation of this statement in the press, you may be sure it will be welcomed by those who are making the present protests.

"We also know that as late as May 14, the chairman of this Commission, in a letter to Congressman WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr., stated very definitely the following:

"'You are advised that the Commission is studying all of the evidence involved and as yet has not reached a decision with regard thereto. I will be pleased to advise you of the Commission's action just as soon as the course thereof has been determined.'"

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., May 27, 1935.

Hon. WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN CONNERY: The Commission has had under investigation the broadcast of a program sponsored by the Mexican Government which was originated by station WJZ and carried by other members of the blue network of the National Broadcasting Co. on the evening of March 21, 1935. The portion of this program referred to in your letter to the Commission was a song entitled "En Elogio de Silves", sung in Spanish.

The question as to whether a matter which is broadcast is obscene or indecent must be determined by the application of the rule announced in Duncan v. U. S. (48 Fed. (2d) 128), and other leading cases, which is as follows:

"The true test to determine whether a writing comes within the meaning of the statutes is whether its language has a tendency to deprave and corrupt the morals of those whose minds are open to such influences and into whose hands it may fall by arousing or implanting in such minds obscene, lewd, or lascivious thoughts or desires."

The Commission, Broadcast Division, after careful study of all the facts and circumstances in connection with this broadcast, has reached the conclusion that the program does not fall within the above definition.

The Division desires to express its appreciation for your cooperation in directing its attention to this matter. Because of the large number of broadcasting and other stations, letters, such as yours, are very helpful in the duties of the Commission.

Yours very truly,

E. O. SYKES,
Chairman, Broadcast Division.

FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., June 6, 1935.

Hon. WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN CONNERY: Please be referred to our letter addressed to you on May 27, relating to a broadcast program sponsored by the Mexican Government which originated over station WJZ.

The exact language of the quotation of the rule in that letter is taken from the case of Knowles v. U. S., Circuit Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit, 170 Federal, pages 409–412. This case is cited in the Duncan case referred to in our former letter.

Sincerely yours,

E. O. SYKES,
Chairman, Broadcast Division.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, the resolution is the ordinary resolution for an investigation that is to be thorough and far-reaching. I have received complaints from all over the United States with reference to radio—complaints from labor, from profit organizations, and from nonprofit organizations which have been denied radio broadcasting licenses and time on the radio.

This is not something which has just come up at the present time. It is something upon which I have been working since last April, when 16 Members of Congress, in writing, made a request to the Communications Commission for action on the part of the Commission and for a public hearing.

On the occasion when the Mexican Government entered into a contract with the National Broadcasting Co., for which broadcasting they paid $40,000, it struck me as peculiar that a foreign government should make a contract with the National Broadcasting Co. in order to broadcast foreign propaganda into the United States.

During at least one of these broadcasts an obscene song was sung.

Affidavits and statements were presented showing the exact words that were sung, affidavits from persons who heard the broadcast. Officials of the National Broadcasting Co. have related how the narrator took a piece of paper out of his pocket and sang this song which was allegedly obscene. All of this the Federal Communications Commission has, or should have, full knowledge of.

Now, we—not just I, but we, 16 Members of Congress—signed a petition asking for a thorough investigation and public hearing.

In response to those requests we received a letter saying that they, the Commission, had investigated the matter, and that as far as they could see, under the law, they could not do anything about it, quoting the case of Duncan v. United States (48 Fed. (2d) 128), and in that quotation describing what has been ruled as obscene. Looking up the case the Commission cited, I discovered there was no such language in that decision as the language they gave me in the letter. Some days later they discovered that themselves, and wrote me a letter telling me that in the case of Duncan v. United States (48 Fed. (2d) 128) the language which they had used referred to another case, and they went back to 1883 to find a case with which to whitewash the National Broadcasting Co. Duncan v. United States (48 Fed. (2d) 128) was a case alleging a violation of postal regulations. This case was acted upon some 40 years before Congress regulated broadcasting.

Mr. Chairman, there have been plenty of complaints. Take the case of a labor station in New York City, one of the first stations in New York. This station attempted to get increased facilities so that it could reach up into New York State and into additional sections of Connecticut, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. Other people put in petitions at the same time, and as a result of those petitions, as I recall it, the Federal Communications Commission gave the time which should have been given to the labor station, which is broadcasting an educational and instructive program not duplicated in that area, and which would have rendered some service to the people of the United States, when men like Senator WAGNER, and others, men prominent in public life, could have told the American people the situation in Congress in respect to labor matters and progressive legislation. The examiner for the Commission in his report called attention to the service rendered by this labor station, but the Federal Communications Commission gave that time to the Brooklyn Eagle, a newspaper published in Brooklyn, which will simply duplicate existing programs and which had no need of the time, because Brooklyn is well covered as far as radio broadcasting is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 minutes more.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I have received these complaints from all over the Nation. The Commission refused to take away a license from WJZ after an obscene song had been sung, and yet there was the incident in the Middle West where the engineer of a broadcasting station, without the knowledge of the owner, pushed up the power so that it reached out a little farther than the Federal Communications Commission felt they should go, and the Commission was going to take that license away completely on the ground that nothing of that kind should occur. Here was a man, the owner of the station, who did not know what his engineer had done; and they were going to penalize him and take that license away. That was a small station, but when the National Broadcasting Co. comes in and puts a foreign government on the radio for the sum of $40,000 and sends insidious propaganda and obscene and indecent songs into the homes of the American people—songs not fit to be recited anywhere—we have a different story. The National Broadcasting Co. must be and is whitewashed. Why? Does this monopoly control the Commission?

Mr. Chairman, I think the American Congress and the American people are entitled to know what is going on in that Commission, how they are allocating radio facilities, and why they are allocating them as they do—why they will not take away a license from those broadcasting companies when those companies permit the broadcasting of an obscene and indecent song into the homes of the American people. I think the people are entitled to know what it is all about and who really controls this governmental agency. I have filed this resolution here today for that reason.

There is no politics in it; there is no partisanship about it. The radio can be used for the most insidious propaganda, as was evidenced in that Mexican Government program, and I want to see that this great avenue is still to be controlled by Congress. I want to see that these radio facilities are allocated properly. I want to find out why it is that education, labor, religion, the veterans, farm and other non-profit-making enterprises cannot get radio facilities or proper time on the radio. I want to find out everything that is going on there in a thorough investigation, in order that the people of America may be apprised of the workings of the Commission. If they have nothing to hide, we will be glad to hear their story. If they want to tell everything that goes on there, we will be glad to hear their story. If there is anything wrong over there which should be shown up, and I personally think there is plenty of wrong, then the people of the United States should be apprised of these facts, and the only way to do that is by an official, unbiased committee of this House, conducting a thorough and complete investigation of the Commission, with a proper report to the House.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Are the complaints which the gentleman has received based on the fact that the radio station has refused them free time?

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, no.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Or time for which they were willing to pay?

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, no. I want to make that clear. When I say time and radio facilities should be allocated to education, labor, religion, veterans, farm, and non-profit-making enterprises, I mean that they should be permitted to go in and secure radio facilities or they could buy their time, and that the National Broadcasting Co. or the Columbia Broadcasting Co. should not have the right to say, "No; we will not let you have the time." The influences of this monopoly should not be allowed to deprive these nonprofit organizations of facilities they should have.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The gentleman does not contend that the Federal Communications Commission has any authority over any individual radio station or chain to compel them to give free time?

Mr. CONNERY. Oh, no.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Or to give time to anyone if their time schedules are filled?

Mr. CONNERY. No. But their time schedule can be very conveniently filled if the Veterans of Foreign Wars or the American Legion want to talk of the bonus, or if you want to make some labor speech or some speech in which they—the radio monopoly—are not interested. They can be conveniently filled, and we do not want them conveniently filled. We want the educational, the religious, the labor, the farm, the veterans, and other non-profit-making bodies to be able to secure radio facilities they can operate themselves, permitting the stations to be self-sustaining but not profit making, instead of being dependent on the charity or good will of the radio monopoly.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. RICH. I was wondering whether we do not have farm hours on the radio. I listen to the radio every once in a while, and I have heard somebody making a speech about the farms, and then I have heard other speeches being made.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks. I hope we will soon have an opportunity to get this resolution passed and find out what is really going on. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to my colleague from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I am in entire accord with the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] for an investigation of the allotment of time by broadcasting stations. Much has been said about these broadcasting stations contracting more time to one party than the other. I am willing to admit, of course, that when the President speaks, he should have a radio hook-up; and I venture to suggest that if we go back to Republican Presidents we would find that they, too, had radio hook-ups and that they were allowed more time than the opposition party.

I had not expected to speak on this issue, but in view of the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], I thought I would make a few observations dealing indirectly with the partisan issue involved.

As a minority party we cannot object to the fact that the President has radio hook-ups when he speaks, but I feel that the question is one of degree, and that prominent Republicans, when they speak, should likewise have at least one of the Nation-wide hook-ups. I have reference now to a speech that Senator BORAH is to make in Brooklyn, possibly the first speech he has made before a large mass meeting of the American people for a considerable time, which is to be delivered on January 28. Senator BORAH was unable to get time from either one of the national networks that would be convenient for the audience. The President, perfectly rightly and justly, received time at 9 o'clock here in the House. Naturally Senator BORAH, who will be the only speaker at that mass meeting, cannot keep his audience until 10 o'clock or 11 o'clock at night to begin his speech. The Columbia broadcasting station offered time at 11 o'clock at night. The National Broadcasting Co. offered time at 10 o'clock at night.

I am probably the last person in this Congress to complain against either the Columbia or National Broadcasting Cos., because they have invariably been fair with me and have offered me time and given me time when I wanted to speak 15 minutes at their studios. All I am asking—and I am sure the Democrats will go along with me—is not that we have exactly the same time as the President of the United States, but that when men like Senator BORAH or other leaders of the Republican Party are going to speak at a great mass meeting, they have at least one of the Nation-wide hook-ups, or that they have at least part of one of those hook-ups. The National Broadcasting Co. has two networks—the blue and the red. The result is that Senator BORAH will speak in Brooklyn on the 28th over WOR, a local New York broadcasting station.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. I noticed in this morning's paper an article where Governor Landon said that on the 29th of this month in Topeka, Kans., he is to speak on a Nation-wide hook-up.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is correct; and I could add quite a number of others. I have been trying to be fair. I could give you a list of a number of other Republicans who have received 15 minutes to speak, but what I am interested in in this case is a national hook-up for half or three-quarters of an hour to carry Senator BORAH's speech to every fireside in the country. I could go further and mention the National Radio Forum, sponsored by the Evening Star of Washington, a splendid paper, that has been going on for a number of years, but three out of every four speakers have been Democrats since March 4, 1933, and that is not either fair or proper for an alleged nonpartisan forum where both sides of issues are supposed to be presented. This forum has, in my opinion, become largely a sounding board for New Deal propaganda.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I hope the gentleman will not interject any partisanship into my remarks. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Could they not say all they have to say in 15 minutes?

Mr. FISH. If you ask me, I could not say all I have to say about the New Deal in a couple of hours.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. Is it not a fact that before either of the large broadcasting companies can give any time to anyone, such as time for the President's speech or Senator BORAH's speech, or anyone else, they must first get permission from the people to whom this time has been sold? In other words, if it is the Chase & Sanborn "dated coffee" hour at that time, they must first get permission from the person to whom that time is sold.

Mr. FISH. Now, the gentleman is asking me a question and not making a speech. I would say I do not know the procedure, but let us assume that the American Liberty League had the same time that the President wanted, I do not know what action they would take, but I think even in courtesy they would yield to the President, and I think likewise, they should yield to Senator BORAH or some other prominent spokesman for our party.

Mr. BLOOM. But the broadcasting company has no discretion in the matter at all.

Mr. FISH. Oh, they have plenty of discretion. They have a contract with every one of them that they can cancel themselves in an emergency, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. BLOOM. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. Nothing like it.

Mr. FISH. They have definite understandings, whether it is a contract in writing or not.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I yield. Of course, I want to be corrected, if I am wrong.

Mr. O'CONNOR. When the President spoke, both stations had to get consent to cancel two programs.

Mr. FISH. That is right.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And at a great expense; and they could not have given that hour to the President unless those customers had agreed to cancel their programs.

Mr. FISH. I think the broadcasting companies have not only a certain amount of moral suasion in such matters but actual cancelation power if the broadcast is sufficiently important to the American people.

Now, let me proceed. I now approach another subject, with charity for all and malice toward none, because I believe in freedom of speech on both sides, even within my own party.

A prominent member of my own party, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, took occasion a few days ago to make an attack on the record of Senator BORAH in a letter and had it published in the New York newspapers. Now, I believe in his right to hold any views he wants to; but I do not believe in the right of anyone, whether he be Republican or Democrat, to misrepresent the views of any individual, to tell half truths, or to reach plausible deductions from false premises; and for this reason I am going to answer the statements made by Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, merely to correct the record on facts that are easily ascertainable and show that Senator BORAH has not supported the unsound and unconstitutional New Deal measures and that any such implication is most unfair.

It is true Senator BORAH supported, I assume, the regulation of the stock exchange bill, the regulation of the security exchange bill, the social security bill, the Home Owners' Loan Corporation Act, the bank-deposit insurance bill, the Farm Loan Act, and other needed legislation of this type; but that does not make him "a hopeless reactionary" or a supporter of the New Deal or the Roosevelt administration any more than any other Republican, including myself, who voted for the same measures.

The statement issued by Nicholas Murray Butler in opposition to Senator BORAH is good for a million votes throughout the country. Dr. Butler, who admits that Senator BORAH "is much the ablest and has by far the best understanding of the fundamental principles which are at stake of any Republican mentioned for the nomination for President", takes a violent exception to his candidacy on the ground that he is against the League of Nations, the World Court, and entangling alliances.

It is well for the American people to know that Dr. Butler is chairman of the board of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and as such he has been promoting for many years our entrance into the League of Nations either through the front door or the back door on every possible occasion and receives large sums for traveling expenses to Europe, where he has been visiting several times a year for the purpose of promoting our entrance into the League of Nations and the World Court and informing European statesmen that we are about to do so.

In spite of Dr. Butler's fulminations against Senator BORAH for opposing the World Court, in all fairness it is but right to point out that there were only eight Republican Senators who voted for our entrance into the World Court in the last session of Congress. At that time Dr. Butler stated that all Republicans who voted against it were "cowardly and ignorant."

Dr. Butler goes on further to denounce Senator BORAH because he opposed, along with practically every other Republican in the House and Senate, turning over power to the Secretary of State to write tariff schedules and to enter into reciprocal trade treaties. It is true that Senator BORAH voted against the reciprocal trade agreement bill and issued a statement opposed to the recent Canadian bargaining pact, which is detrimental to the interests of the farmers of the East and of the West.

In the next campaign three of the greatest issues that will be upheld by the Republican Party will be the preservation of constitutional and representative government, for which Senator BORAH has been the most outstanding spokesman in the country; opposition to entangling alliances and entrance into the League of Nations through the back door; and protection of American wage earners against the low standard of wages and living in foreign countries. On all these issues Senator BORAH has voted not only with the Republican Party but has been the leader in most of these fights.

As Al Smith often says, "Let's look at the record." In spite of inspired and prejudiced propaganda against Senator BORAH's nomination, emanating from big interests, which have no control over him, and repeated by Nicholas Murray Butler, to the effect that Senator BORAH has voted for most of the New Deal measures, the actual answer to that kind of propaganda is the record of his votes. Dr. Butler's attack on Senator BORAH for supporting the Roosevelt administration measures is laughable, as on numerous occasions on his return from European visits Dr. Butler has released to the press, on landing, the most glowing endorsements of President Franklin D. Roosevelt and his administration.

The actual record of Senator BORAH's votes shows that he voted "no" on the passage of the National Industrial Recovery Act, which has already been declared unconstitutional. He voted "no" on the Bankhead cotton-control bill, which will probably be held unconstitutional within a very short time. He voted "no" on the reciprocal trade agreement bill, which ought to be held unconstitutional, as it delegates the legislative powers of Congress to the President in violation of the Constitution. He voted "no" on the so-called Guffey coal bill, which likewise will probably be declared unconstitutional, and there was no record vote on the potato amendment, but he gave out a statement that he was opposed to it and has on file numerous letters in which he has answered his constituents who favored the bill that he was opposed to it on constitutional grounds.

A few more attacks such as that made by Nicholas Murray Butler on the record of Senator BORAH and his strong views against the League of Nations and entrance into ancient foreign blood feuds and boundary disputes will mean the nomination of Senator BORAH by the Republican Party on the first ballot and his overwhelming election.

While Dr. Butler was for the Versailles Treaty, Senator BORAH opposed it; while Dr. Butler was for cancelation of the war debts, Senator BORAH opposed it; while Dr. Butler has for all these years been trying to involve us in every kind of foreign commitment, war sanctions, and the League of Nations, Senator BORAH has opposed them all.

Dr. Butler called Senator BORAH a reactionary for being opposed to internationalism. No, Dr. Butler; it would have been fairer to have called him a great American and follower of the precepts of George Washington. Senator BORAH, it is true, is a "stand-patter" for American principles of government, the Constitution, and Americanism as opposed to internationalism. [Applause.]

I hope all Republicans in the House will pay attention, because it will be for their benefit later on to know what Senator BORAH's record is; and I ask the minority leader, in particular, if he will kindly pay attention. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAMBETH and Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

Mr. FISH. I yield first to the gentleman from North Carolina. I hope he does not want to ask an embarrassing question.

Mr. LAMBETH. My only purpose is to keep the record straight. The gentleman is talking about keeping the record straight.

I want to ask the gentleman, in view of the attacks that have been made by him and other members of his party upon the President and this administration for not carrying out to the letter the Democratic national platform of 1932, whether it is not a fact that the Republican platform of 1928 and the Republican platform of 1932 each declared for adherence to the World Court?

Mr. FISH. If the gentleman from North Carolina says so, I will take his word for it.

Mr. LAMBETH. I have the document right here in my hand.

Mr. FISH. I will take the gentleman's word for it, and it is a good point. It is true that only eight Republicans voted for it in the Senate. I do not blame them for changing their minds in view of the refusal of our former allies to even pay interest on the money we loaned them after the armistice.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Some of us are rather curious to know why the gentleman from New York in occupying the floor is so anxious to have the attention of the minority leader to this statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. FISH. Well, if the gentleman asks me that, I must say only to enlighten him on this subject; that is all. [Laughter.]

I wanted also in this discussion to answer the charges of Secretary Ickes against President Hoover for signing, as he alleged, three unconstitutional bills. I propose to put the facts in the RECORD, and it is very easy to present the facts, because the record speaks for itself. But the gentleman from North Carolina brought a somewhat political issue into my nonpartisan remarks.

Mr. LAMBETH. Oh, no; I was only keeping the record straight.

Mr. FISH. He wanted to keep the record straight, and so do I. Your national chairman, Mr. Farley, issued a statement a few days ago deploring mud slinging and saying that this was to be a very dirty campaign. I want to point out to Mr. Farley and the members of his party that the main critics of the New Deal administration have not been Republicans, but that the most vigorous and vituperative critics have been members of the Democratic Party. I refer to Governor Talmadge, of Georgia; to the late Senator Long, of Louisiana; to Governor Ely, of Massachusetts; to Governor Ritchie, of Maryland; and to Alfred E. Smith, of New York; to Senator Reed, of Missouri; to John W. Davis and Bainbridge Colby, of New York. They have gone much further than any Republican in criticizing the New Deal administration and have not minced words or pulled their punches.

I would further point out to my friend that a year or so ago, when any Republican raised his head and had even the temerity like my friend, DEWEY SHORT, of Missouri, to criticize the administration, he was immediately denounced by Mr. Farley as a traitor, a witch burner, and a pirate. This was only a year ago. These are the words of Mr. Farley, who now predicts that this is going to be a mud-slinging campaign. So far as I am concerned, and I hope the Republican Party—we cannot control the members of the Democratic Party from expressing their sentiments—but I hope at least the members of the Republican Party will not indulge in any kind of mud-slinging campaign. [Laughter.] There is plenty to be said from our side against the unsound, un-American, unconstitutional, and socialistic New Deal measures, and I hope that from now on that all Republicans will not pussyfoot and indulge in shadow boxing, but will criticize and denounce without fear or favor the unsound and unconstitutional New Deal measures that have destroyed business confidence and prolonged the depression.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. So much for that.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Certainly; I yield to my leader.

Mr. SNELL. As long as my colleague is trying to give me information, I especially request that he include in his remarks the entire letter of Mr. Butler's from which he has quoted.

Mr. FISH. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. With pleasure.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman from New York has listed a few of the measures which Senator BORAH voted against, measures proposed by the New Deal. Can the gentleman tell the House how many out of the 16 measures that passed the last Congress were voted for by Senator BORAH?

Mr. FISH. Well, Senator BORAH voted for a lot of the good measures of the New Deal, and I am very glad he did. [Applause.] So did I. The Republicans would make a terrible mistake if they start this campaign [applause] condemning and indicting every New Deal measure. They would not get to first base if they went out and attacked the stock-exchange regulation bill, the securities-exchange regulation bill, the social-security bill, and the Home Owners' Loan Corporation bill, which, by the way, emanated originally from President Hoover. Those you claim as New Deal measures. Many Republicans voted for them, and we did it because it was meritorious legislation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why does the gentleman exclude the A. A. A. program?

Mr. FISH. Because Senator BORAH voted for it and I voted against it, and I do not want to disagree with my leader. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. The gentleman always asks me embarrassing questions.

Mr. BOILEAU. I should like to ask the gentleman whether he and Senator BORAH agree with reference to expansion of the currency?

Mr. FISH. That is the same question the gentleman asked me the other day.

Mr. BOILEAU. No; I asked the gentleman the question whether he and Senator BORAH agreed on it.

Mr. FISH. I will talk at length on the stabilization fund next week and answer the gentleman's question at that time.

Mr. Chairman, I must proceed. Secretary Ickes made the statement, which has been repeated a number of times, that President Hoover signed three unconstitutional measures which were passed under his administration. What are the facts? This is not the first time that a Democrat has made that charge. Secretary Ickes made it. Mr. Michaelson, head of your publicity bureau, has made it. Senator LEWIS made a similar statement. Mr. Charles West, former Member of the House, in two debates with me made the statement, and it has been passed out up and down the line by the Democrats that President Hoover signed unconstitutional measures.

What does the record disclose? Out of hundreds of bills that were passed under his administration and signed by him, not one single bill has been held unconstitutional. Yet Mr. Ickes refuses to recall his statement and apologize, as he should do in all fairness, because he made a misstatement of fact. Not one single bill signed by President Hoover has as yet been declared unconstitutional, and there have already been eight declared unconstitutional under this New Deal administration.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman cite one of those bills which was for the general interest of the people of the United States and not for some particular interest in which that administration was interested?

Mr. FISH. If the gentleman and the other Democrats had not sabotaged the sound recommendations of Herbert Hoover after 1930, there would be confidence in the country today and we would know which way we were going.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. FISH. I decline to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Just one question. I will ask a genial question.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the names of the three bills which it is claimed were passed under the Hoover administration and held unconstitutional. As a matter of fact, they were not under the Hoover administration at all. One of them was passed under the Wilson administration, one of them as far back as the Grant administration. Just to save time, I ask unanimous consent to insert the names of those three bills in the RECORD, in order to prevent any further distortion of the facts.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Just the names of the bills?

Mr. FISH. Yes; and the dates.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Supreme Court decisions holding laws unconstitutional: No. 61, May 25, 1931, Indian Motocycle Co. v. United States (283 U. S. 570); No. 62, March 21, 1932, Heiner v. Donnan (285 U. S. 312); No. 63, April 11, 1932, Burnet v. Coronado Oil & Gas Co. (285 U. S. 293).

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, Secretary Ickes has up to date refused to withdraw his statement that President Hoover had signed unconstitutional measures during his administration.

It is only fair in these days when the Constitution is rapidly becoming the paramount issue of the national election to be held this year that the record be fairly presented, and, of course, it is a matter easily ascertainable.

The Democrats are floundering about in view of the increased number of New Deal measures being held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court and do not know in what direction to proceed; whether to come out and ask legislation permitting the Congress to control agriculture and industry through national economic planning, to do which it will be necessary to amend the Constitution, or to attack the Supreme Court by packing it or reducing its powers in other ways.

Pending that final decision it has become the unfortunate habit to make sweeping statements without any basis of fact that President Hoover's administration had passed and he had signed unconstitutional measures, and then when challenged by President Hoover himself, Secretary Ickes refused to retract or admit the record, which is undeniable, so that he who runs may read. [Applause.]

The following is a copy of a telegram sent to Hon. J. HAMILTON LEWIS, United States Senator from Illinois, by Hon. William D. Mitchell, Attorney General under the Hoover administration, from St. Paul, Minn., on Friday, August 30, 1935:

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of August 1 quotes you as saying under President Hoover three specific administration acts carrying the policies of the Government were declared by the United States Supreme Court to be unconstitutional. This statement has been construed to mean that the invalid statutes were enacted during the Hoover administration. Senator ROBINSON so construed it in his radio address of August 22, and Charles Michaelson (publicity man for the Democratic National Committee) has issued a general press release that the Supreme Court has declared void three acts of Congress signed by President Hoover.

The three acts of Congress declared invalid during the Hoover administration were tax statutes passed in previous administrations, one being as far back as the Wilson administration. No act signed by President Hoover has ever been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. On the contrary, he vetoed a deficiency bill because it contained an unconstitutional delegation of Executive authority to a congressional committee.

I am sure you intended to state merely that the three decisions referred to were rendered during the Hoover administration and not that the unconstitutional acts had been approved by him. Would you kindly confirm this publicly?

And I am also including a copy of telegram to Secretary Ickes from President Hoover at New York on January 10, 1936:

My attention has been called to an untruthful statement made by you at Rochester, N. Y., January 3. You said: "Under Mr. Hoover * * * Congress passed laws which were held unconstitutional."

Not one of several hundred acts of that period has been held unconstitutional. I never signed a law without bearing in mind the special obligation which rested upon the President to protect the Constitution.

The falsity of this statement, which originated with Mr. Michaelson and other New Deal sources, was promptly and publicly exposed by former Attorney General Mitchell on August 13 last. Its falsity has been repeatedly pointed out in the press. At a time like the present your action calls for an apology to the public.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MONAGHAN].

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to express my deep appreciation and profound gratitude to my distinguished colleague from the State of Washington [Mr. KNUTE HILL], who has so generously given up 10 minutes of his time in general debate in order that I might have a small pittance of the time I should like to have to discuss a subject in which the country is so vitally interested today, namely, old-age pensions. May I say at the outset that I shall not yield to anyone, because I have not the time.

There is on the majority leader's table a statement by the American Institute of Public Opinion—which might well be a subsidiary of the American Manufacturers Association, the Liberty League, or the Chamber of Commerce—that the American people are 9 to 1 for old-age pensions.

It is stated that the Townsend plan is sectional and confined to the West. That statement may be disproved in two ways: First, there is the steering committee selected from the 63 who signed the petition to bring the Townsend plan to a vote by my good friend the author of the bill embodying the Townsend plan, the gentleman from California [Mr. MCGROARTY].

M'GROARTY BILL, H. R. 7154, TOWNSEND PLAN STEERING COMMITTEE

JOSEPH P. MONAGHAN, Democrat, Montana; C. G. BINDERUP, Democrat, Nebraska; JOHN T. BUCKBEE, Republican, Illinois; WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Democrat, Massachusetts; BERTRAND W. GEARHART, Republican, California; ISABELLA GREENWAY, Democrat, Arizona; WILLIAM LEMKE, Republican, North Dakota; ERNEST LUNDEEN, Farmer-Labor, Minnesota; VERNER W. MAIN, Republican, Michigan; VITO MARCANTONIO, Republican, New York; JOHN A. MARTIN, Democrat, Colorado; SAM C. MASSINGALE, Democrat, Oklahoma; THEODORE L. MORITZ, Democrat, Pennsylvania; JAMES W. MOTT, Republican, Oregon; ABE MURDOCK, Democrat, Utah; THOMAS O'MALLEY, Democrat, Wisconsin; EDWARD W. PATTERSON, Democrat, Kansas; J. HARDIN PETERSON, Democrat, Florida; JAMES G. SCRUGHAM, Democrat, Nevada; MARTIN F. SMITH, Democrat, Washington; MARTIN L. SWEENEY, Democrat, Ohio; J. WILL TAYLOR, Republican, Tennessee; THEO. B. WERNER, Democrat, South Dakota; COMPTON I. WHITE, Democrat, Idaho; JOHN STEVEN MCGROARTY, Democrat, California, chairman ex officio.

You will note not only is the West included but also the Middle West, the East, and the South; such States as New York, of which the gentleman from New York, Mr. MARCANTONIO, is the member on the steering committee for the Townsend plan; the State of Pennsylvania, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. MORITZ, is the member; the State of Florida, of which the gentleman from Florida, Mr. PETERSON, is the member, and the State of Tennessee, of which the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. TAYLOR, is the member. The Townsend plan is not sectional and nonpolitical, as a glance at this committee will indicate.

Further in contradiction of the fact that the Townsend plan is merely sectional, I cite to you the following statement written by Dr. Irving Fisher, that renowned and erudite economist who does not believe that the Townsend plan is workable. He says in part:

DR. TOWNSEND'S PROSPECTS

(By Irving Fisher, professor emeritus of economics, Yale University)

Inconspicuous in the news of last week was the second slight rumbling of a great national menace, all the more serious because so seldom taken seriously.

The first slight rumbling was in Michigan a month ago, when a follower of Dr. Townsend won the nomination for Congressman in the Republican primary in Kalamazoo.

The second rumbling was in Alabama a few days ago, when a follower of Dr. Townsend based his candidacy for Congress, in part, on his support of the Townsend old-age-pension plan, "or one similar to it."

These straws show the political wind is blowing in the direction of Townsend. Other candidates will come out for Townsend if they think they can win thereby.

It is reported that Dr. Townsend claims 30,000,000 supporters. This is probably an exaggeration, but there can be no doubt that the true number is a huge one. It must run into the millions if not the tens of millions. Why such prodigious support?

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter and data sent to me by Dr. Fisher.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I read Dr. Fisher's letter.

NEW HAVEN, CONN., December 31, 1935.

Congressman JOSEPH P. MONAGHAN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MONAGHAN: I have read with interest that you intend to vote for the Townsend plan, and am sending you enclosed an article on the subject. I hope the report is erroneous. Economically, the plan is, I think, certainly unsound. I believe that it would do the country very great harm indeed should Congress enact it.

As you are reported in favor of it, I should, however, be glad to have you tell me in what respect you believe that the arguments of my article are invalid and to learn your reasons for wanting to have the Townsend plan enacted.

I may add that when the plan collapses it cannot but hurt those who have favored it.

Very sincerely,

IRVING FISHER.

This great, renowned economist makes three misstatements of fact in his mimeographed sheet against the Townsend plan. He first says that Dr. Townsend, who happens to be seated in the gallery today, merely answers the opponents of the Townsend plan with a wave of the hand, stating that economists are theorists. In this connection, Professor Fisher also says:

DR. TOWNSEND'S MAGIC

Last week among the numerous newspaper references to the Townsend plan was a statement by Dr. Townsend that "the economists have no answer to our plan. They don't know whether it will work or not because it is new, but they haven't been able to convince me that it won't work. I have talked with a number of them, including Irving Fisher, of Yale, and all they can say is that the plan would create a scarcity of commodities and raise prices. The trouble with these men is that they are not economists; they are so only in theory. This is a practical thing."

In other words, Dr. Townsend has no support from economists and so concludes that economists are not economists except in theory. On this "practical thing" we should put our faith in a retired dentist, whom the economists "haven't been able to convince that it won't work."

Consult Congressman WERNER, of South Dakota, your colleague, and you will find that the learned and distinguished economist, Irving Fisher, errs with respect to the man whose plan he is attacking. Dr. Townsend is not a dentist. He is a physician of renown, whom Congressman WERNER, at a table in the House dining room, lauded most highly for outstanding, unselfish, and humanitarian work in riding through the Dakota blizzards bringing aid and succor to the sick and helpless. This heroic work places him so high above the level of paid economic advisers that they are not worthy "to touch the hem of his garment."

As a professor emeritus of Yale University, Dr. Fisher should be a master of English. Permit me to point out a grammatical error in his remarks. He says, to quote him exactly:

How can a national income of only $50,000,000,000 per annum afford to spare about twenty billions for the old aged?

Redundancy is bad grammar. A dictionary states that "old" and "aged" are synonymous. Since either "old" or "aged" is superfluous, the double term probably is used disparagingly, in which event we should not give ear to his lack of respect for the aged. Otherwise he was ignorant, in which event his arguments are not worthy of our consideration. Again I cite a discrepancy of logic. How can an inanimate object be guilty of "affording to spare"? Again a superfluity of language, two superfluities in the same sentence.

I believe he was intoxicated by the exuberance of his own verbosity, which simply means that he was full of a lot of redundant statements, "full of sound and fury signifying nothing." That is why I asked that statements of this profound and outstanding economist be placed in the RECORD, that you may carefully weigh them yourselves.

I find not one valid refutation of the Townsend plan in Dr. Fisher's statement. On the contrary I find insinuations against the merit of the soldier bonus bill recently passed by this Congress by such an overwhelming majority. I find that the N. R. A., which was likewise equally passed by an overwhelming majority in the first session of the New Deal Congress, condemned by him as being fallacious in principle. I find that the A. A. A. he believes to be unsound and fallacious, perhaps because the Supreme Court, above the power of control of the people, declared it unconstitutional. But he says the Townsend plan, almost alone among the many panaceas which the great depression unearthed, merely naively represents economic fallacies. This, Mr. Chairman, is the statement on the Townsend plan of one of the outstanding economists of this country:

Economists are convinced already and hope they can convince Congress before the country is experimented on and nearly wrecked, as it would certainly be.

No economist sponsored the N. R. A., and many economists opposed it; but it was tried and failed. It retarded recovery.

The soldiers' bonus proposal, wrong as it is, has, or at any rate had, in the form presented by Congressman PATMAN, the merit of creating new purchasing power. The N. R. A. and A. A. A., though representing, fundamentally, wealth limitation or destruction, could put up plausible arguments, and the latter could even boast of some support among professional economists.

All of the monetary policies of the present administration, even the worst, namely, the silver purchases, had some modicum of economic justification.

Father Coughlin's monetary program has been very largely sound.

Even Huey Long's vague proposals for sharing the wealth had a certain degree of soundness, so far as the inheritance of wealth is concerned.

But the Townsend plan, almost alone among the many panaceas which the great depression unearthed, merely and naively represents economic fallacies.

There never was a time when sound economic instruction was more sorely needed than now to combat such economic illiteracy.

This abuse of the mentality of the public, of the Congress, and of the President is his only answer to the Townsend plan. Note the mistakes in English, as well as the mistakes of fact with respect to Dr. Townsend, which I pointed out in his remarks and letter, and then say whether or not you believe this intellectual giant, who is so careless about his facts and English, is worthy to dictate the economic policies of our country. In his letter he states:

I think it is certainly unsound.

Analyze that language, "I think it is certainly unsound", a woeful contradiction in terms. A man cannot "think" a thing is "certainly unsound."

Dr. Fisher states:

No economist sponsored the technocracy mania. In that case, too, there was only one sponsor, but one who nearly captivated the whole country. That mania also did harm.

What harm, pray tell, Dr. Fisher?

It is amusing to hear the paid economists of Wall Street prate. Consider the Townsend plan with respect to the amount of the annuity, $200 a month. Is such an amount ridiculous in the extreme as we have been led to believe? By no means.

I have enumerated cost items, and I am going to talk facts and figures and not just make the carte blanche assertion that Dr. Fisher, because he does not know what he is writing about and about whom he is talking, is therefore wrong. I shall present facts and figures to you if I have sufficient time.

What amount can the average individual of America live upon?

Now, at the outset, I challenge any Member of the House to indicate what items which I have set forth alongside the amounts that have been stipulated he would want any member of his constituency to be denied. I have not set forth what I think should be the standard of living for the aged. I am setting the barest minimum of what they should get.

Now, here is that minimum: Rent, $12; electricity, $2.25—of course, the rates are too high—phone, $2.50—it is also too high in rates—laundry, $4. Some of you perhaps would have the aged woman do the washing herself. Newspapers, $1.50; fuel, $15; insurance, $10. The aged people have spent a lifetime contributing to insurance and should not be expected to drop it either on their lives or homes. Food, $30.

That is very small. My secretary, Miss Ford, informs me that she and her mother cannot live on less than $50 a month as far as food is concerned. Clothes, $10.

Carfare, $4; drugs—that includes razor blades, tooth paste, shaving creams, and cosmetics, $5; water rent, $2.

That makes $103.25.

The rent should be increased by $12 to provide fairly decent living quarters for the aged American people. That would be $24. Then food, $50 at the minimum, and with the other enumerated increases would amount to $135.25.

Now, there are other items that are not included in the general household expense. There is tobacco, and automobiles, which have come to be recognized in this day and civilization as a necessity, and a radio, which many aged people have not been able to buy.

Then there is $5 for entertainment, so that they may entertain old-time friends or attend the theater. Then, outside of newspapers, I have included $3 for magazines and books. Mr. Fisher says that these people are economic illiterates. Go to the American public and tell them that they are illiterates and many of you will not come back. [Laughter and applause.]

Yet, here is what Dr. Fisher evidently thinks of the public, millions of whom he says are for the plan as above stated:

> One can easily understand why a large fraction of the 10,000,000 people over 60 years of age favor Congressmen who claim to favor a plan by which all over that age will be assured an income of $200 a month.
> But why should the probably still greater number of those not yet 60 years old favor a plan by which they must bear the cost in higher taxes?
> The answer undoubtedly is to be found in the economic fallacy of "purchasing power."
> Frank Vanderlip once said that this Nation is a nation of "economic illiterates." The popularity of the Townsend plan proves it. It is the best example, on a large scale, of an economic fallacy, unadulterated.

When I finished that and totaled it up, I found that I had $175.25, and I again issue a challenge to any Congressman to state in what particular amount he would have reductions made. There is a balance of $29.75. This would permit merely $1.49 increase in the total of each item that I have enumerated. Since there were 20 items enumerated, the total would be $200 a month. I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD at this point the enumerations.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Chairman, my strong advocacy of income, gift, and inheritance taxes is vindicated by the following statements in two reports that came out recently, one from the Government and one from Wall Street, showing a contrast which should be of interest to everyone concerned with national affairs, and I ask unanimous consent that this may be placed in the RECORD at this point in its entirety.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The first report came out in December, and was made by the F. E. R. A. on the basis of an investigation conducted in Winston-Salem and Durham, N. C., and in Richmond, Va. It says: "This study shows the situation of the tobacco workers on relief in the Virginia and North Carolina regions. Nearly half of them were receiving relief at the same time that they were receiving wages.

"Most of them had been on relief for considerable periods—more than half for 3 months or more. Three-fourths of them came on relief in less than 8 weeks after the loss of jobs.

"The factor most significant in bringing tobacco workers on relief is underemployment. Workers in the families studied averaged only 91 days' work out of the normal work period of 200 days in the year. Low wages are also an important factor. Average annual earnings were $144; only 12 percent of the single-worker households made as much as $300.

"Perhaps the most striking fact disclosed was that the average weekly income from earnings of the 477 families in the 'sample' studied was $3.02. For households containing only one wage earner the weekly average was $2.35, and for households with two or more workers the average was $4.97."

The other report, the one coming from Wall Street, gave the net earnings of the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. This company, one of the "big four" group in the tobacco industry, has its factories in Winston-Salem, N. C.

In 1935 the net profits of this company amounted to $23,896,398, or $2,000,000 more than in 1934. This sum is nearly 50 percent greater than the entire wage bill of the entire cigarette and smoking-tobacco industry, as reported by the Census Bureau for 1933.

The R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. was formed in 1899 with a par value of outstanding stock of $2,100,000. There is no record of subsequent addition of capital from the outside. Today's profits are, therefore, more than 1,000 percent on the original investment. Capitalization, of course, has been increased by reinvestment of profits and through the exploitation of the workers.

This contrast between wages, on the one hand, and profits, on the other, which is largely duplicated by the other member companies of the "big four" group in Durham and Richmond, is not the only contrast existing in the tobacco industry. Louisville, Ky., which is the center of the two leading competing independent companies, namely, Axton-Fisher Tobacco Co. and Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corporation, both of which conduct 100 percent union shops, showed one of the lowest relief records in the United States. Last July only 5.4 percent of total families in Louisville were on relief, compared with a load of 20 and 30 percent in many other cities throughout the country. The burden for the State of Kentucky as a whole was approximately 20 percent.

These contrasts are worth pondering because of the light they throw on monopolistic practices.

Little wonder that the "big four" strenuously oppose a reduction of the tax on 10-cent cigarettes, as proposed in several bills before the House. The "big four" do not manufacture 10-cent cigarettes, but the independent companies do. The tax on all cigarettes is 6 cents per package, whether they sell for 10 cents or 15 cents. This inequitable tax squeezes the independent companies, and the "big four" do not want it changed. Their impregnable position in exploiting labor, and no less the farmers might be threatened if the small competing companies were given a chance.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Exploitation of the workers and this failure to pay these people adequate salaries that would give them a chance to provide for their old age is the answer to those who see no immediate need for old-age pensions. Derelict Representatives and Senators and derelict Presidents who have failed in the past to protect them is the answer to the raison d'être for that condition.

Let us be sensible about this Townsend plan. Why is it necessary to give these people an adequate pension today? Because they were not paid $750 or $800 a month. Aye, not even $200, $150, or in many cases $100 a month. They were not paid $200,000 a year, and were not able to provide themselves an annuity, as have the executives of industry, who no doubt have sponsored all this propaganda against the aged people of this country. Consider the argument about the great cost of such a plan. I have not nearly adequate time to answer the objections raised. Let us consider other costs—the cost of war alone, for example. It is all right to spend billions to destroy the youth of this country. Sure, they say, go ahead and destroy them. That is the theory of those men who would not protect the aged. If it would add one penny of profit, they would tomorrow plunge America into war. But, thank God, the good sense of the American public will not permit them to do so. If they put guns on the shoulders of soldiers again, they better beware where the firing is done. Let us spend some of those billions wasted in battleships and airplanes in the advancement of happiness for the aged people of this country. Let us spend some of the billions that have been wasted in futile works in W. P. A. in taking care of the aged people of this country. Then young men and women will find permanent employment. That is the answer to the question raised by Dr. Fisher about Peter Young and Paul Old, which you may read in his remarks.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONAGHAN. In a moment. Peter Young has to remember that unless something is done about taking care of these aged people and taking them out of industry, these men who 6 years ago were about 14 years of age and who are now 20, will find themselves with nothing to do. Think of the number on the market today without an opportunity of employment. The answer to that, as Dr. Townsend so well stated yesterday in an address to the Optimist Club at the Mayflower Hotel, is an adequate old-age pension, and I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point what Dr. Townsend said.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The machines are becoming idle because there are too few buyers. That presages a revolution of some sort. It is for us to decide what sort of revolution we want. It may be violent and bloody if we do not exercise judgment and tact and make immediate changes in our industrial and financial world.

An ever-lessening number of workers from the present onward into the future will be required to do the world's work.

Unless our thinking men and our lawmakers recognize this social phenomenon and make provision to meet its consequences by establishing a more abundant and equitable distribution of our easily created wealth, there will be speedily brought about one of two things, either a government ruled by the rich and powerful with the masses in virtual serfdom, or a violent revolution of the poverty-ridden masses with its unguessable results.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Will the gentleman grant me 5 minutes more?

Mr. WOODRUM. I am sorry, but all the time has been allocated. I can give the gentleman 1 minute.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I yield now to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. We made a present of $22,000,000,000 to Europe, did we not?

Mr. MONAGHAN. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. A kind of a Christmas present of $22,000,000,000, and when a question comes up, even should it cost $24,000,000,000 to try out this plan, what do we find? There was not any turmoil about the $22,000,000,000 that we gave to Europe, but there is a lot of excitement about spending $22,000,000,000 on the American people.

Mr. MONAGHAN. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has again expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. LEMKE].

Mr. LEMKE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not discuss the political situation, because as a nonpartisan I have discovered that there is very little, if any, difference between the liberals on the Democratic side and the progressives on the Republican side. Their hopes and aspirations for the future of this Nation are virtually the same. I have also observed that there is very little difference between the conservatives on the Democratic side and the conservatives on the Republican side. They are both satisfied with things as they are; glad that they are not worse. I shall, however, discuss the agricultural situation as it exists today.

After having wandered around in the wilderness, led astray by Mr. Harriman, of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and a few inexperienced professors, we are back today where we were 3 years ago, at the beginning. There is absolutely nothing left of what we have done or had attempted to do for the farmers, because we got tangled up with the Supreme Court of the United States. The decision of the Supreme Court, whether it guessed rightly or wrongly, is still the supreme law of the land, so we are back at the beginning, and we must do something for agriculture. Every Member on either side of this House is free now to use his own judgment to do something for agriculture. Therefore we are back again to the original Farmers Union program, cost of production for that part which is consumed in America [applause] and the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill. [Applause.]

My friends, do not get the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill mixed up with the Frazier-Lemke moratorium. It is true the Supreme Court did make a mistake in its decision on the original moratorium bill, and we passed a second one, complying with all the mistakes of the Supreme Court, if you please, and that one will be held constitutional. But a moratorium means to stand still, and the American farmers are old enough. They will be 3 years older when that moratorium is over. The farmers do not want to stand still. They want to be refinanced, pay their cerditors, and go ahead. Let us therefore do something intelligent, something that will benefit not only the American farmer but the American businessman. Let us refinance all existing farm indebtedness under the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill. That bill has now been before this Congress for over 5 years, and there never was a day within those 5 years, I am satisfied, but what that bill would have passed the House of Representatives by an overwhelming vote if we had been able to get a yea-and-nay vote, as your Chief Executive said that we could get in this House. Why can we not get it? May I say it is because of the obsolete system of rules and regulations of the House and the ancient and corroded patronage system. I say to you that we must discard those. We must become citizens of the United States—not Republicans or Democrats for the time being—and do that which is for the best interests of the American people.

The Frazier-Lemke refinance bill has nothing in it that is not constitutional. There is no constitutional question involved. It provides that the existing farm indebtedness shall be refinanced at 1½-percent interest and 1½-percent principal on the amortization plan by the Government of the United States of America, not by issuing more tax-exempt, coupon-clipping bonds for the international bankers, but by issuing $3,000,000,000 of Federal Reserve notes. Oh, yes. Now I hear my banker friends say, "That is fiat money." Again may I say to you we have issued today over $4,006,000,000 of Federal Reserve notes on nothing except hot air, if you please—a bond—a debt of the Government of the United States. A bond is only hot air, a promissory note of the Government. We have given this $4,006,000,000 to the international bankers for only seven-tenths of 1 cent per bill. It makes no difference whether that bill is a $1 bill or a thousand-dollar bill. All the international bankers give for that money to your Uncle Sam is to put up a bond from which they clip the coupons and pay seven-tenths of 1 cent to get it printed, simply the cost of printing. Under the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill the farmers of this Nation will pay 1½-percent interest each year and the Government of the United States in 47 years, the time required to amortize those loans, will make $6,345,000,000 net profit. Do you see now why the international bankers and coupon clippers are opposed to that bill? There is no question why we have that opposition. But the Congress of the United States must give voice to the American people's mandate. We are going to a vote eventually, why not now? The sensible and reasonable thing to do is to give us a vote on that bill.

We have at the Speaker's desk Resolution 123, known as petition no. 7. That resolution provides that this bill be brought on this floor for 6 hours' general debate and then under the 5-minute rule for amendment. No Member, whether he is for the bill or against it, can stand here as a believer in the American form of government and deny us that right. They may refuse to sign, but they cannot but admit that our cause is just; that we have a right to have this bill brought onto the floor of the House and disposed of on its merits. We do not care whether you vote for or against it, but we have a right to bring it up here for 6 hours of debate, and then with the right of amendment, and have it disposed of by a yea-and-nay vote, so the world may know where we, as Members of Congress, stand on that legislation.

The Agriculture Committee in both the House and Senate reported this bill out for passage favorably. Thirty-two State legislatures, the Territory of Hawaii, and, in addition, the lower houses of New York, Pennsylvania, and Delaware have asked Congress to pass this bill. It has the militant support of the National Farmers' Union and of the National Union for Social Justice. It has the endorsement of many State and local farm bureau and grange organizations. It has the support of labor leaders and officers of the Veterans of Foreign Wars. It has the approval of over 90 percent of the people of this Nation as well as of every intelligent banker, business and professional man and woman.

The Farmers Union has been back of this bill since 1930, yet we have not been able to get a vote on it. Ninety-five percent of the farmers of this Nation demand that this bill be passed. Many of the small bankers of this Nation have passed resolutions asking that it be passed; and if any of you doubt it, you can come to my office, and I will show you letter after letter where these bankers say it is the salvation of agriculture and that the bill should be passed. Yet, for some strange reason, we cannot get a vote on it. What is the power behind the scenes that can prevent that bill coming to a vote? There is not a Member who has ever opposed this bill on this floor, because they know they cannot answer its logic. Yet we can beg in vain. We have tried every way possible, and we still are being blocked in getting a vote on this bill, when the Chief Executive has told us that every bill that has that backing ought to be disposed of on the floor of the House upon a yea-and-nay vote. I think the time has come when we must realize that we are just the hired men of the people of the United States, their Representatives.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEMKE. I yield.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. How many farmers of the country would your bill affect if enacted into law?

Mr. LEMKE. It will save over 2,000,000 farm homes. The general impression is that the Federal land bank is meeting the situation. I talked last night to this group of farmers that Mr. Wallace brought here, and they tell me there are more foreclosures now than there were a year ago. They tell me the Federal land bank has become even more strict and is tightening up the ropes.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I am for the gentleman's bill.

Mr. LEMKE. I know the gentleman is.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. LEMKE. Now, the Federal land bank absolutely is not helping any farmer who really needs help, who is in real danger of losing his farm, and I am not criticizing them, because under the legislation we have passed they cannot do it. I will go even further and say that only about one-eighth of the farmers in distress can ever get help from the Federal land bank under the present bill. In my own district, of 64,000 applications where commitments were made, 38,000 were canceled because the commitment was not sufficient to meet the requirements. Were you a mortgagee would you want to cut your mortgage 25 percent below the actual value of the property? You would not.

Therefore, I beg each and every Member of the House who has not yet signed petition no. 7 to sign it. I appeal to your sense of fairness and justice. I appeal to you as a believer in representative government and a square deal. I appeal to you in the name of 30,000,000 men, women, and children who live on farms. I know you will not disappoint or fail us. [Applause.]

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORITZ].

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to speak on the circulation of money or currency expansion, which is another way, a polite way, of talking about the Townsend plan. I did not want to say I was going to talk about the Townsend plan primarily, because it is obnoxious to some Members, so I shall talk instead about the circulation of money.

A short while ago I came across an old issue of the magazine called Real America, the issue being that for December 1933. In this magazine I was delighted with an article on money. I showed it to a gentleman whom I consider the foremost authority on money in this Congress, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BINDERUP], and we read it together. I want to read you now a quotation from this article. It is as follows:

CIRCULATION OF MONEY

We have had demonstrated to us in the last year that control of the amount of money in the country or bank credit, whichever you want to call it, can no longer be trusted to Wall Street financiers or to bankers. These gentlemen were allowed to run things very much as they pleased from the passage of the National Banking Act in 1863 until they finally succeded in busting nearly every bank in the United States on March 3, 1933. We are going to have some startling reforms in money and banking. Whether they will take the form of a new and thoroughly sterilized and fumigated gold standard, with rigid control over the export and import of gold, or whether the Government will adopt a "rubber" or "accordion" commodity dollar which will be changed every 30 or 60 days in value so as to keep prices and wages steady has not yet been determined.

But one thing is certain—we are not going back to the worship of the golden calf and to the rule of the magicians and witch doctors of Wall Street, who made money and credit into a kind of black magic, a mystery not only to the people they skinned but even a mystery to themselves. The reason why we are not going back to that condition is not that we are so much wiser or more moral than our fathers and grandfathers, but simply because conditions have so changed that the old hit-or-miss money system is impossible any longer. That system fitted the age of oxcarts and sailing ships fairly well, although it was not perfect even then.

It simply will not work today. Modern civilization can only be kept going by a continuous increase in the spending of money by all groups of society. The whole set-up of the old banking and money system was to encourage hoarding rather than spending. We have got to make money easier to get and create more and more inducement to spend it rather than save it or our whole business system will blow up. This may be good or bad, who knows?

But good or bad it is a condition, not a theory, and the reason we cannot go back to the old system of finance was well put by J. P. Morgan, Sr., father of the present "J. P.", when he said 25 years ago, "You can't unscramble eggs."

THE CIRCULATION OF MONEY

This, Mr. Chairman, was written by Harper Leech in an article in the Real America, December 1933, long before the Townsend plan was known. I do not know whether the Townsend plan, as it is set up in the McGroarty bill, is 100-percent perfect, but I do know that the spending theory is sound and is the only assurance we have of permanent recovery. Dr. Townsend has stated before the Ways and Means Committee that if the age of 60 is not practicable to start out with, he would be willing to start at the age of 75. He has told me personally the reason he has advocated $200 per person per month is that no politician can come along and raise the "ante."

Just as sure as the human body cannot live without the circulation of blood, and vegetation cannot live without moisture, so society cannot function without the proper circulation of money. The scoffers and those that are shallow minded shout that if a certain sum of money will bring back prosperity why not magnify that sum fivefold and bring back a "boom." The circulation of money must exist and it must be adequate, but it should not be superfluous. No housewife would think of pouring a barrel of salt on the Sunday dinner roast. The circulation of money is to society what correct seasoning is to food.

I should like to ask you learned Members of Congress who scoff at everything that is new to consider this example: A card game is in progress and the sum of money that all the players have amounts to $100. Each player has a different amount but the sum total equals $100. By mutual consent they agree to throw 2 percent of each play in the common fund; this fund is not the rake-off for the benefit of the house, as was done heretofore, but it is to be used by the player who gets "broke."

Suppose this fund should at one time equal $20. Then the sum total that the other players have is only $80. But as long as they all have money the game continues. The harm is done when one player succeeds in getting all the chips, to the detriment of the other players, just as in the case of J. P. Morgan.

I should like also to call to the attention of the learned and superior-complex Members of Congress that the college professors and economists of Columbus' day scoffed at Columbus and predicted that the world was flat. If Columbus had paid attention to these so-called learned men, we would not now be associating the discovery of America with the name of Columbus.

I should like also to call your attention to the fact that every man that possessed an original idea had to be content to "suffer the scorns of outrageous fortune" before they were hailed as heroes. Note the example of the inventions of the steamship, the telegraph, the telephone, the airplane, and radio—things now we look upon as commonplace.

I should like to call your attention to the years it took to get the Patman soldiers' bonus bill in the present status. The vote yesterday was 218 to 100 to discharge the Committee on Ways and Means on the Patman bonus bill. What would have been the result 7 years ago?

Is there anybody who would contend that the money put in circulation at present by the $5,000,000,000 appropriated by Congress is not responsible for the betterment of the present conditions? Is there anyone who would contend that the $5,000,000 put out by General Motors as a Christmas gift was not responsible for the big Christmas boom in Detroit, Flint, and Lansing, Mich.? Would anybody contend that when the soldiers are paid their bonus that prosperity will not be given another boost?

These appropriations, Mr. Chairman, are merely shots in the arm, and yet they have a temporary prosperity effect. What, then, is obnoxious or repugnant in a permanent recovery plan—a depressionless United States? It is easy for you who are making a comfortable salary to scoff at an original idea, but if you should unfortunately be plunged into the despair of no earning capacity because of a depression, your minds would change; your points of view would slightly color.

Your duty, then, is to unite under a committee of the whole and to work out this idea. If you do not like the transaction tax, cooperate with Dr. Townsend and show him how he could obtain the funds from the strictly luxury commodities tax, from stock-exchange transactions tax, and from tax on gross returns of corporations and from huge estates of over a billion dollars, and from the revenue of absentee landlords who live outside of the United States or who live outside of the community from whence they draw their wealth.

In conclusion I wish to read you a communication from Father Cox, who lead an army of 25,000 jobless men to Washington in 1932 and who proposed then to appropriate $5,000,000,000 for public works, and was scoffed and scorned at, just as Dr. Townsend is today. And yet it is a fact that this Congress has appropriated that sum. It is this same Father Cox who relates, when he interviewed President Hoover on that march, President Hoover remarked, "They were doing too much then for the unemployed."

To the Members of the House of Representatives of the United States:

HONORABLE GENTLEMEN: The world has come to the end of an era. The industrial age has revolutionized the condition of mankind. We can produce easily more than man can use for his present necessities according to the economic set-up in vogue.

We will always have 12,000,000 unemployed in the United States of America. They cannot be annihilated or neglected.

We have laws protecting and caring for the birds of the air, the beasts of the field, and the lilies of the valley. We must have a fundamental solid method of caring for these 12,000,000 people. Eight million are men and women over 60 years of age. We cannot care for them by the methods of an era that is passed. The old tools and the oil and gasoline that made the economic motors spin up to 1929 can no longer perform the task.

The profits from machines are greater than from the labor of men and women and children. These profits must be so distributed as to care for those whose places have been taken by mechanical devices.

If a war should come tomorrow involving America, $40,000,000,000 could immediately be appropriated to carry it on. We feel that a rearrangement of the profit system in America that will reach out and care for these 8,000,000 old people over 60 years of age and these 4,000,000 unemployables not yet 60 should be the care of our democratic form of government.

The only liberal, up-to-date, feasible plan that has been proposed to care for the victims of the economic order, that has been permanently put out of joint by changing conditions, is the Townsend old-age revolving pension plan.

The $200 a month would be spent in much the same way as the inhabitants of Coxtown, who were paid in Coxtown currency, which entitled them to furniture, clothing, and food, which was in the commissary at headquarters.

The commissary, according to my idea, would be the combined products of mill, mine, and farm, which should not be destroyed while people are starving.

The Government, in order to prevent production for necessities, has paid for nonproduction because the people had no money to buy the things they needed which are so bountifully provided by the Almighty.

We present this petition in the name of thousands upon thousands of young and old, of both sexes, of every race, color, and religion, from western Pennsylvania, Ohio, and West Virginia, who have written me asking me to present to the President of the United States, the Senate, and the House their attitude with regard to the Townsend old-age revolving plan.

Unless something is done—and speedily—the people cannot much longer have patience with the slow functioning of age-worn constitutions and laws that do not meet present-day requirements.

A speedy, radical change is imminent in our system of government unless the people, who are the Government, are satisfied.

The Government alone, according to the Constitution of the United States, has the power to print and issue money. There must be enough in circulation to make it an effective medium of exchange. We need money. The Government can and should give it. What is money? Who can explain it?

Respectfully submitted.

REV. JAMES COX.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD].

THE DESTRUCTIVENESS OF WASTE AND EXCESS OVERHEAD BURDEN

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, information comes to me from the Department of Agriculture that about 14.5 percent of the gross income of farmers operating mortgaged farms is required for the purpose of paying interest charges alone. If we add to this the running tax charges and, on those farms which are operated by sharecroppers and tenants, the amount of rent they must pay for the use of the land, we immediately see a great proportion of the gross income is dissipated before the farmer thus burdened can go into the consumers' goods market and acquire products turned out by what might be termed "industrialized specialized producers."

Yesterday afternoon we had the privilege of listening to the wise words of the gentleman from Texas, whom we all love. Running true to form, he told us some things which were good for our political souls and made some suggestions which, if carried out, might be very conducive to a higher level of spiritual life. He was dealing in a general way with factors which have to do with imports, exports, home production and consumption, and trading ability and buying power. When it comes to horse trading, he is no novice. And when a man with this rare ability adds a great understanding of national and international law and an outstanding legislative and political record and then speaks, we can well afford to weigh carefully his words; and when I say "we", I refer specifically to the new Members of this body, into which class I must fall.

In business or in active politics; at home or away; in the continental United States or abroad in other lands; walking, traveling overland, on train, or in the air—there constantly hovers about me a realization of the presence of an utterly unbearable overhead burden in the form of unreasonable interest charges, high taxes, excess commissions, depreciation, obsolescence, uneconomical planning and execution, transportation charges which cannot be justified, and numerous other ruthless charges applied which the producer cannot bear. It is waste, extravagance, exploitation against the primary producer on every hand, until the whole scene becomes sickening. Any intelligent man or woman knows the 1935 industrial, economic, and political machine cannot perpetuate itself unless the masses have buying power.

FOREIGN NATIONS PROFIT BY OUR WASTE

Foreign countries are taking note of this great overhead burden which rides the air and strangles the primary producers of this Nation. Other countries realizing our helplessness in the situation are industrializing against our waste and staggering excess burden and are now invading our markets in a most deadly manner. At the same time their profits are unbelievably high and effective wages have increased as much as 60 percent, and still they can undersell our processors as much as from 25 to 75 percent. Excess overhead burdens are rampant in our daily personal lives, in our homes, in our shops, banks, on our transportation lines, in our politics, and in every activity and walk of life. Anyone who cares to take a stopwatch, a pad and pencil, and go out and make observation can find so much proof in support of these statements that before he has spent 72 hours at the job he will become sickened with the heathenish waste which pervades and permeates our every thought and step in life.

Between what the primary producer receives for his labor and what the specialized producer-consumer can pay for what he consumes there is a margin. At the top there is a price beyond which the specialized producer-consumer cannot go. From this top price there is first deducted the cost of this excess overhead burden to which I refer. After this deduction is made, which, of course, includes the profit of the processor and the cost of the exchange machine, the primary producer receives the balance, or what is left. As usual, the deducts get most all there is, and the farmer particularly is left without purchasing power.

No nation of wastrels can stand up against one which operates with an economic sense of balance in its national and international activities. Heathenish practices are not restricted to the spiritual world. If cleanliness is next to godliness in the world of spiritual and physical action, then through economical living must be found that cornerstone on which rests a social life which eliminates crime and promotes cleanliness and godliness. No individual and no nation can justify waste. It is a mark of savagery in its most destructive form. Observation of wildlife in its natural state convinces us such life does not waste its resources either before or after capture. No man and no nation can fairly claim a high degree of civilization if he or it is a wastrel. Nowhere in the realm of civilized man is there a proper niche for the factor of waste. It is unethical; it approaches the immoral even if it be unmoral; it is a violation of trusteeship; it is wrong. The administrative officers of a small or large unit of government are unfaithful if they practice waste. The head of an organized business ceases to be a real leader of men and workers when his administrative policies smile upon and encourage waste. In doing so he robs the capital structure of his organization and violates his trusteeship. He helps to break down the social structure of organized society, because through setting the example of waste others follow his example and general collapse is the ultimate result. Waste is a malignant growth, highly destructive, whether it operates in the spiritual, physical, material, or economic world. No nation and no individual should condone it and every intelligent man and woman should oppose it in philosophy and in practice. It is bad for every citizen. It is good for no one.

Dr. Will Durant, noted writer on philosophical subjects, speaking at a town hall audience last Sunday evening, made the observation that four basic problems confront the American people, three of them being the decay of our moral life, our economic system, and the political system. With him millions of our people will agree without argument to the contrary. The press reports his suggested panacea in part as the economic problem could be solved if the able minority in power could learn to discipline itself sufficiently to permit such a distribution of wealth as would keep the purchasing power on a level with production capacity. As one member of the minority I desire to go on record as agreeing with Dr. Durant in this statement. To me it is very fundamental to the economic welfare of our people, to the protection and maintenance of our so-called capitalistic system, to the preservation of our present Constitution and our form of government generally.

In line with the thought expressed by Dr. Durant and with an eye to reinstating the buying power of the primary producers of this land, the elimination of waste, and the decrease of overhead burden which is now utterly impossible for the mass of our people to bear and make progress under, I yesterday introduced a bill—H. R. 10195—which I trust will give some food for thought in the solution of definite problems the Congress and our people are struggling with today.

Mr. Chairman, at this point I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this subject, and to include a copy of the bill which covers two pages.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, the editorial challenge to the Congress appearing under date of January 12, 1936, in the Washington Herald, and doubtless all other Hearst papers, should be given attention. It calls emphatically for definite and firm congressional action, and it would seem that the American people would stand almost unanimously with the Congress on a policy of such action. In part, it reads as follows:

Fortunately the Supreme Court is not composed of small, timid souls as Congress is.

The Supreme Court has a duty to perform under the Constitution and has the courage and ability to perform it.

It is not a collection of white rabbits like the Congress, timidly blinking their pink eyes and tremblingly scurrying off to their burrows at the sound of the Presidential voice.

The Congress has not enough courage to maintain American traditions and sustain American institutions.

The Supreme Court has the courage. It is serving the American people.

It is saving the Nation. * * *

The preparation and submission of a bill to the Congress, if such a bill is of far-reaching importance, is of vital interest to the public, legislators, and many others.

The delays and changes, the support and opposition by groups and individuals prior to its formal and public consideration may be of vital importance and may or may not be in furtherance of truly democratic government.

The bill is given here following; and thereafter a brief explanation of its provisions, necessity, justice, and effects.

A bill to provide revenue, and for the general welfare of the United States; to establish an economic balance in the relations between the people, ownership, and the Government; to reestablish the priority rights of the people to their production; to remove certain economic barriers which tend to restrict trade and commerce; to restore and increase production, trade, and employment, and increase the enjoyment of the benefits flowing therefrom; and to provide for the proper administration of this act, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "Ownership Act of 1936." The provisions of this act shall apply on the 1st day of the first calendar month following the passage of this act and succeeding taxable months and years.

SEC. 2. A tax is hereby imposed at the rate of 5 percent per annum on the value of all ownership and/or possession of lands, waters and their contents, ships and boats, bridges, tunnels, roads, means of transportation and communication, mines, wells, goods, chattels, bonds, stocks, shares, mortgages, contracts, notes, promises to pay or accomplish, agreements in writing or verbal, vested patent and/or leasehold rights, goodwill, buildings, equipment and furnishings, and all other ownership, personal and real, and including moneys, domestic and foreign, and all the ownership of other things of value used and of use in shelter and the general enjoyment and maintenance of life, comfort, and safety, and all the ownership used and of use in production, mining, manufacturing, service, commerce and trade, both foreign and domestic, wherever located or transacted within the boundaries of the United States or of its Territories, colonies, or possessions, by whomsoever owned and/or possessed, whether such owner and/or possessor shall or shall not be resident in or a citizen of the United States or its Territories, colonies, or possessions, to be paid to the United States Treasury: Provided, however, That this taxation shall not be in force as against and shall not apply to owned and/or possessed goods or properties and contracts or other values and rights as afore and hereafter said and described in general terms and is intended to be inclusive of all ownership and/or possession of all types and classes of any value whatsoever:

(A) If such ownership and/or possession together and concurrently be actually in the exclusive current and continuing enjoyment, service, and/or reasonable use of—

(1) (a) A natural person having residence and citizenship in the United States or of its Territories, colonies, or possessions, and subject solely to the laws thereof; or

(b) A natural person as said and described in (1) (a) above, who from reasonable conditions and circumstances, either wholly or partially is dependent upon such owner and possessor for shelter, support, and/or gratuity of the given and accepted amount, kind, or class, reasonably in that condition, and not for the means and purposes of evading, lessening, or changing the force and effect of this tax imposed:

(B) If such ownership and/or possession be used solely and exclusively by a person or persons, natural, corporate, or a firm or organization of lawful designation, not of necessity completely as to amount or time, but reasonably, in the mining of metal, coal, salts, or kindred products, or in the production of oil, gas, or water from wells or other sources, stone from quarries, or in the production, generation, distribution, and sale of power, or in manufacture, trade, service, commerce, transportation, or exchange, or for other purposes, by and under the direction of the legal owners and/or possessors and/or legally constituted and designated managers, directors, and/or trustees;

(1) Under the condition that such owners, possessors, and/or legally constituted and designated managers, directors, and/or trustees shall legally hold and possess written authorization as duly and properly issued by a legally constituted or chartered community, city, State, or Federal authority, certification evidencing and in evidence of the public convenience and/or necessity of such activity and functioning in manufacture, trade, service, commerce, or exchange, or other activities, to be or being transacted at such time and place by the owners and/or possessors, managers, directors, and/or trustees; or

(C) If ownership and/or possession be in such form and condition that the possession or use must be and naturally and reasonably is partial, not for the means and purposes of evading, lessening, or changing the force and effect of this tax imposed, then the proportionate extent of exclusive use is the measure and proportion of exemption from the provisions of this taxation hereby imposed, and the share and proportion not exclusively used by such owner and/or possessor shall be subject to the taxation provisions of this act; or

(D) If a specific ownership and/or possession, by the contract of its separate possession, and in fact, shall not operate to return to its owner and/or possessor as an effect of such ownership and/or possession any sum or benefit beyond and in addition to the reasonable and/or actual depreciation, maintenance, repairs, taxation, insurance, and/or other reasonable costs and charges to which the specific ownership and/or possession is reasonably and/or actually subject and/or liable only during such separate possession.

SEC. 3. A true return shall be prepared, signed, and forwarded by the taxpayer or his duly accredited or authorized agent to the Treasury Department of the United States, before midnight of the 5th day of the month, listing, together with its value, the ownership subject to this taxation as of the last day of the preceding month not a Sunday or a legal holiday nationally recognized in the United States, including therewith the sum of one-twelfth of 5 percent per annum tax hereby imposed, in lieu of which payment at said time collection shall be made by the Department of the Treasury in the manner of other delinquent taxes and sums due the United States: Provided, however, That if, as of the date of the return, the liability under the terms of this bill has not existed for the entire calendar month, there shall be included therewith, in lieu of the sum of one-twelfth of 5 percent per annum, one three-hundred and sixty-fifth of 5 percent per annum for each day on which liability to this taxation did in fact exist.

SEC. 4. The undeclared ownership and/or possession of specie or of any recognized medium of exchange of the United States or of any foreign nation held in an uncommon, unusual, or evidently hidden and secret manner, which has or may have the result and effect of evasion of the provisions of this bill, shall subject such owner and/or possessor to any or all of the penalties provided in and by the so-called gold-hoarding provisions of Treasury Order No. —— and/or any other provisions of law applicable.

SEC. 5. Ownership and/or possession, as contemplated by this act, shall not be removed from or maintained outside the jurisdiction of the United States, its Territories, possessions, and colonies, unreasonably in amount, time, or place for the purpose, means, and intent of avoidance of the terms and provisions of this bill; and for the purposes of this act such removal and/or maintenance is a defrauding of the United States and/or a conspiracy against the United States; and upon proof and conviction, in addition to such other penalties as the court may impose, may operate to remove all or such specific exemptions from this general taxation of ownership and/or possession as the court may direct for a period of not more than 5 years.

SEC. 6. The Department of the Treasury of the United States is authorized to collect this tax and to expend from unencumbered funds the amounts necessary for the collection of these taxes, and to prosecute in the United States or other courts claims arising under this enactment.

AN EXPLANATION OF THE OWNERSHIP ACT OF 1936

People, individually or as a group, may be presumed to be able to protect themselves. When it is considered that fleetness of foot, or the ability to promptly change locale, is actually a protective factor of immense importance, this defensive power of people as regards their personal safety is seen as quite impressive, although not necessarily heroic.

Property ownership, and wealth in general, may or may not have this natural defense of mobility; and the common defense to which people may agree as to their persons cannot be extended to property ownership with equal ease or justice.

The common protection of life also is naturally of individual concern and fairly equal benefit—each individual possessing an equal share. But the common defense of property or ownership, especially if unequally divided, where many of the common defenders may actually have less than nothing to defend—or be in debt—and where others may have much greater ownership than they could possibly defend, and which in fact they may never have seen, must lead to a situation and condition where many contribute their defense, even at the risk of their lives, to the benefit of such property ownership but receive absolutely nothing in return for this service; while for an exactly equal contribution toward this essential and actual ever-present common defense another individual is receiving a vast amount of this valuable protection essential to the privilege and continuance of private ownership.

It may be surprising that ownership actually has obligations; and this one of defense is one of the greatest. That an army or a navy should be considered as the largest and most important part of a national defensive force, even when that force is expanded to its utmost in time of war, is an important error.

The correction of this inequality of contribution and receipt of benefits is well within the powers and responsibilities of the Congress, should its correction become advisable, and it should be apparent that now it has become desperately advisable; and the mechanics of this equalizing are a part of this bill.

That it is actually of vital importance is plain historically. The establishment of the present form of government following the American Revolution was made possible by the fact that the Armies of this country were composed of men defending their own farms and homes. The rather feeble and quite abstract government was not a part of the daily lives of the general population—whether they would have a king, in their own right, they did not know—and they were not defending any abstract governmental theories or policies but, in a very natural, historic, and time-tested manner, individually and collectively, with their lives, they were defending their own property, as people always have done; and if the overwhelmingly vast proportion had not then owned their homes and farms there would have been no war—or at least no successful war—and there would not now, probably, be a United States.

The fact that the population today, both rural and urban, lacks this individual ownership is of monumental and immediate importance, vital to national safety. The rented or mortgaged farm or house, or even the high-priced apartment, do not and cannot supply the necessary impetus to justify their protection at risk of life; and this plain and definite fact constitutes and is an immediate and present threat to domestic tranquillity and to the continuation of an independent form of government.

The placing of a Federal tax assessment upon all ownership as a definite, justified, and firm step toward the correction of this dangerous condition is not subject to reasonable criticism. It may well be called "national defense." As a permanent measure, the adoption of a firm policy to prevent the recurrence of the present condition is an evident constitutional responsibility of the Congress and involves no transgression of any personal right of any citizen. This action is the first part of this bill.

The second step of this bill completely exempts from this tax the ownership—by the individual and his natural or actual dependents—of his home, his farm, his furniture, even his private golf course, or his private polo field. This is certainly a broad exemption.

The third step exempts all ownership used in business holding a certificate of public convenience and necessity issued by a city, State, or the Federal Government. The Constitution certainly did not confer upon its citizens complete irresponsibility as one of its many blessings; and it did not confer it upon business, or business activities, or property of any nature, or upon the Congress itself, or upon any branch of the Government. The people are responsible to each other, to their communities and to their States, and to the Federal Government; Congress itself is responsible to the people; and ownership and business which demands or feels the need of complete irresponsibility certainly is not entitled to their free protection. The 5 percent a year tax is not confiscatory and it is not punitive.

It should be apparent that the economic and commercial factors and elements upon which people depend for their economic welfare should in justice be responsible to the people.

The next step is section c, which gives complete exemption to partial ownership and use in that proportion.

Section d, the next step, in fact, gives wide exemptions from this taxation to ownership which does not receive a net return.

Although this subject of a return to ownership has been given remarkably little specific attention in history and economics, apparently being considered a natural, necessary, and not particularly undesirable condition incident to and a part of private ownership, a close study brought to light many rather astonishing facts and conditions of terrific economic and governmental import. Among them those factors suddenly stand out in bold relief for the purposes of this bill.

Under no conditions does a return actually accrue to the ownership which the owner himself uses, even the investment in his own business by the businessman. It has been an exclusive privilege of a type of absentee ownership. With an admittedly rough but brief classification of rich and poor it has been and is a privilege only of the rich, which the poor have not and could not possibly have, because they use all they own and probably more of necessity, and it is not actually a possibility even to the comparatively prosperous.

The farmer resident upon a $10,000 farm or a $20,000 farm, for example, receives no income from that ownership; yet even at the low rate of 6 percent a $5,000 mortgage would return to its ownership $300 per year, which might exceed the entire earnings of the farmer during that period.

The businessman, the craftsman, the farmer, the artist, the artisan, the professional man all stand actually in very similar relations. The agriculturist farms his acres; the businessman farms his business; the professional man his knowledge and skill; the craftsman, the artist, the same. The income and reward of each ceases when their personal efforts cease; and no income whatever accrues to any of them from their respective ownerships.

The farmer's farm, the urban dweller's home or tools, the businessman's $10,000 investment in his buildings, equipment, and stocks; the professional man's $20,000 or more invested in education, highly specialized training, books, equipment, and place of business; and even city, State, and governmental ownership of buildings or battleships return no income to ownership and do not lead to the receipt of any unearned income whatsoever; and these respective ownerships have in fact no privileges whatever over the ownership of the farm in that respect.

No ownership should have rights superior to the basic ownership of the farm. Economically it is suicidal in its eventual effects; and it is continually unjust in every instance at all times, although the injustice has been and is deeply hidden to a remarkable degree; and the results not only almost impossible to trace to their real source, but apparently traceable to some other source. Briefly, an income to ownership in the economy of a nation leads directly to destruction of internal markets, centralized ownership, unemployment, general bankruptcy, a break-down of the monetary system, and eventual dissolution of the governmental structure, and, of course, the loss of all ownership of every nature so far as the protection by government guarantees the ownership.

As an illustration of how deeply hidden: Consider the United States as a new country; no large fortunes, and even those fortunes receiving actually no income as a result of ownership; the people generally self-supporting; and a popular fear of indebtedness and mortgages—which has only disappeared quite recently—and the businessmen owning their own buildings, stocks, and equipment. In such a group there was practically no return to ownership.

The Constitution was written specifically eliminating every rank or condition or possibility, almost, which might then or in the future lead to irresponsible power; safeguarding to everyone their ownership—which was the benefit of their production in general—in every manner they could imagine.

After the new Nation was organized, in actual practice the Constitution worked. There was a testing period of substantial time; and then arrived the natural complications of foreign trade, some mechanization, trade, money and coinage, and foreign imports, taxation—and after the testing period and after the approval of the machinery of government, and after these other complications arrived to hide its results, this income to ownership began its operations, and not until then.

Moreover, it appeared absolutely just in every particular. There was an existing legal structure in the English common law, largely unquestioned, handed down from the ancient Romans. It was one of the immovable things which courts could safely tie to and forget; and it apparently was only reasonable that if one man rented another man's extra house—or extra money—that the owner should receive a reward for his industry, thrift, and foresightedness in having the house or the money available. Certainly the two parties, in conference and agreement and without undue pressure, would arrive at a satisfactory agreement, and the law of supply and demand would operate to insure justice in general from such transactions.

Every part of the workings of an absolutely firm economic law—that there must be no return to ownership—was hidden as deeply as that.

The difficulty of finding the error should be apparent; but an important fact is this: Those people had left a social system where the error was present, and the benefit of their productivity went to someone else—apparently justly, true; but they left that situation, even if it was justice; and left their friends and relations and safety and came to the new country, where their productivity was to their own benefit. The present population of the United States would quickly migrate in large numbers to that original condition, if that were possible.

In fact, those early Americans left a place where the economic error was present, where ownership was taking the benefit of their production, and came to a place where the economic error was not present and their production, little as it might be or as much as it might be, under the new conditions would belong to them; and they never left the new condition to return to the older country, where the economic law was being broken. Actually the conditions in the new country were just to them and unjust in the old country. They were productive people, and those conditions were unjust to productive people, as they are now.

They were not seeking a location where their ownership would give them an unearned income. They were seeking a place where their efforts and industry and enterprise would give them an earned income; and they found it in the new country. This bill returns that honest condition which has been lost. Honest people and an honest nation should welcome such a change.

There is no unearned income. The common use of the term indicates a condition where the one who actually earns does not receive the benefit of his effort and enterprise, but, instead, the benefit is received by someone who had no part in its earning.

Passing lightly over such a condition as involving a property right, therefore to be enforced by government and consented to, is governmentally unwise, at least. If such income is not a property right, what then? This conclusion cannot be escaped: that if unearned income is not a property right, then Government—the Congress—might be accused of being at least an accessory to a very unsavory performance.

Present laws quite completely protect those who have from the depredations of those who have not. Briefly, the present legal structure justly protects the rich from having their accumulations taken from them by the poor.

This bill accomplishes a duty which should not be necessary in a civilized country; it protects those who have not from those who have. It protects the poor from the rich; it protects productive people from the depredations of a type of ownership which has wrongfully and unjustly claimed and received the benefits of their production and enterprise and has impoverished productive people and bankrupted and ruined able and enterprising businessmen.

In brief explanation of the claimed purpose of this bill to remove economic barriers, restore production, distribution, and employment.

Business is, of course, primarily the exchanging of people's production. Capital charges are not a normal or necessary part of the overhead of a businessman in his owned business, with his own equipment and buildings and financing himself. There is under such a condition no return to ownership.

In a group of productive people owning their own homes and farms and businesses there is no return to ownership, and their production belongs to them, to consume or trade as they see fit. Despite their productive capacity, if they must pay to ownership—only the ownership of this surplus over use type of ownership—they themselves are impoverished to a greater or lesser degree and destroyed as buyers and consumers to a remarkable extent.

Ownership does not consume, it does not use, and it is entirely dependent upon who receives this unearned income as to whether and how completely it is to be expended for shoes or groceries or whether it is to disappear entirely from circulation and become available only for investment or loan. The percentage of this unearned income disappearing from circulation in this fashion is, of course, vastly greater than in the case of earned income; and with centralization of ownership and many other conditions which have arisen and increased governmental, individual, and commercial indebtedness, that factor is largely responsible for freezing the economic system.

Increasing the capital charges of business, to be passed on to the producer in lower wages and the consumer in higher prices, further blocks and decreases trade; and the combination naturally forces the unfortunate businessman to borrow from the bank, or some other source, on such terms as he can. With not enough business to pay the interest on his present loans, or reduce his present indebtedness, or pay his taxes, his position may be understood as somewhat difficult.

Removing from ownership—solely, of course, this surplus over use ownership, its unearned income, and bringing its privileges down to those of the farm—no more and no less—has these effects immediately.

Higher wages and salaries, lower prices, lower rents, vastly increased employment naturally result from the higher wages and lower prices and rentals; these are urgently necessary and possible by these means.

New internal buying, by the creation of new internal markets; new foreign buying, through the lowering of costs to reasonable agreement with world competitive levels, decreased overhead to an amazing degree, with the cutting off of capital charges in loans and rents, increase of transactions by a suddenly developed new buying market; these should interest any businessman.

Although these natural effects may appear somewhat startling, suddenly ending the breaking of the most vital and basic of economic laws can be depended upon to furnish many pleasant surprises, and a host of economic evils apparently due to some other causes disappear with astonishing celerity. Believing that it is a step which might have hidden dangers is, to say the least, uncalled for. There will be instead a certain appearance of hidden benefits. It is hardly necessary to "taper off" when ceasing to break an economic law; it is economically safe, one may be sure, to cease breaking it immediately.

It should be quite clear that the economic law—ownership is its own reward; it must have no income—is a very reasonable and just law. The breaking of it will eventually wreck any monetary system, political economy, or governmental structure which could be designed. No compensatory scheme for favored or selected classes, such as the recently banned A. A. A.—no matter how worthy the groups selected—or any Townsend movement, demanding $200 per month minimum, or other similar nostrum, can possibly correct the condition or even cause the present economic tailspin to hesitate.

The ownership of a man's farm, his home, his business, does not take, or even attempt to take, anything unearned, or the benefit of anyone's production, from anyone. Taking or receiving unearned income is not a property right. It is the breaking—or attempting to break—of an absolutely adamant and unbreakable economic law; and the cleverest schemes of financiers, lawyers, and economists have been broken by that law, which is still untouched.

By a sufficiently complete uncovering of many elements involved in the unsuccessful attempts to break this economic law means have been uncovered and designed to cease breaking it, and to cease in an orderly fashion, without taking from the present owners any part of their present ownership—all of which they most certainly would lose with the continuation of the present conditions.

On its face it is a difficult problem—how to rent a house, or business place, or how to have a mortgage on your home, or borrow or loan money, or buy goods on credit or open account—without permitting to any ownership privileges and rights which the farm does not have—and complying with the economic law means only that.

In short, how to change the direction of income without changing or even placing a strain upon the existing capital structure, but instead, strengthening it immeasurably at a desperate time. This bill does that.

No amendment to the Constitution should be necessary to accomplish the purposes of this bill. It would almost be insulting to the memory of those who ably produced the Constitution to hold or believe that it was their intent that there should be in the United States any ownership with rights superior to the ownership of a man's own farm and a man's own business. Such interpretation of the Constitution and its intent would seem to be patently unreasonable—and yet no courts can be held at fault for having placed some confidence in rulings as to property rights which have come down from ancient times, and which appeared to be so reasonable.

This economic power that has grown up—what is it? Is it the ownership by an individual of his home or his farm? No! Such ownership has no economic power whatever. By the process of elimination it can be seen immediately that "economic power" to some extent is the unregulated and irresponsible business ownership, but chiefly the unlimited ownership and control of this surplus over use type of ownership.

Under long unquestioned interpretations of the Constitution property ownership has been held to have what is actually a complete irresponsibility. The Congress, the President, the Supreme Court, and the people themselves were held to a complete and definite responsibility under that same Constitution. The laws of inheritance transmitted this economic power from father to son—under the protection of the Constitution.

There, in short, is a combination of a complete, inherited, absolute, and irresponsible power—from which the American people once revolted—and that revolt from that type of irresponsible power furnished the cause and the foundation for the American system of Government under the Constitution.

The existence of irresponsible power in the United States would seem to be, from this reasonable viewpoint, blatantly unconstitutional; and although this bill removes from ownership that irresponsible power, yet it leaves intact all the ownership and all the rights and privileges which the ownership of the farm and the home have.

But mainly and primarily this is a revenue bill that will produce large revenue even at this time without becoming an additional barrier to trade and commerce. It taxes for the first time a new kind of property—income property—and it is not a tax easily passed on to the wage earner as taxes have been passed on in the past.

It should be evident that it is not a confiscatory tax, and that it is not a punitive tax. It has good and necessary social effects, but evil social effects never have been the test for constitutionality.

Strange, certainly, that it is somewhat of a relief bill without carrying a huge Federal appropriation, but it is a relief bill to productive people who in the past have been forced to pay two and three times for their homes and for everything which they might have to purchase for themselves and their families—at the same time faced with only intermittent employment at low wages—to furnish unearned income claimed as a property right by this surplus over use type of ownership.

It is a relief bill for the farmer. It removes the interest from his mortgage at the same time it removes the interest from the city man's home and from the businessman's business, and in the same fashion, although it does not select the farmer for any special favors or charity; it restores his lost markets, reduces his costs, and reduces the prices for the things which he buys; in the great majority of instances its direct benefits to him exceed the amount of his former A. A. A. checks, or of any similar scheme which might be devised.

It is a relief bill for all productive people, relieving them from the payment of an unjust tribute—which seemed just—to a type of ownership which has accepted the charity of their protection, and in return for that favor has almost destroyed them.

The good effects are accomplished in a safe, natural way, not by artificial means. The sun does not chop the ice from a river or dynamite it to force the water to flow again. It shines on it for a short time, and the river begins to flow, very naturally and smoothly and very quickly.

The present economic structure is frozen. This bill melts the ice and leaves the structure free and able again to perform its necessary and natural functions.

It is a vital bill in this unquestionably terrific emergency, and should be carefully considered.

Until it becomes a law there can be no suitable or permanent or honorable place in the American economic structure and system for the army of young people who never seem necessary until the bugles start to blow, at which times their importance is quite apparent and outstanding, and then they must protect it—a system and structure which a moment before, perhaps, had denied any use or need for their services, actually refused to allow them to enter into or benefit from that economic structure.

This bill, in its effects, takes care of their situation because they are really important people; it is a bill to restore to people their natural rights which have been taken from them by a certain type of ownership, and this was a very unjust taking away of their natural rights.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NELSON].

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, the farm problem is the biggest one that this Congress has to settle. Farmers have had experience with two plans, the Hoover plan and the Roosevelt plan, the Farm Marketing Act, or Farm Board, and the A. A. A., or Agricultural Adjustment Act. Fortunately, a Democratic Congress repealed the one, and, unfortunately, the Supreme Court has just put aside the other. As a result of the Supreme Court decision, and because industry continues to share in subsidies, this Congress must find some way, within constitutional boundaries as marked by the Court, to provide substantial farm aid.

Before suggesting legislative possibilities I desire briefly to refer to past plans. Presidential plans, they might properly be called. The Hoover Farm Marketing Act had its birth in a special session of Congress, pledged by, or for, Mr. Hoover in the 1928 Presidential campaign. The call referred to legislation to aid agriculture and to bring about a limited revision of the tariff. Just here I would especially stress the word "limited", for at the end of some 17 months there had been practically a complete revision of the tariff. The Hawley-Smoot bill, the printing of which made a great "joke book", a tragic joke book of several hundred pages, resulted.

Congress met in special session on April 15, 1929. The House Agriculture Committee, of which I was a member then, as now, spent 2 busy months in writing a farm bill, in all respects pleasing to President Hoover, and which became a law on June 15. On that date eggs were selling at 27 cents a dozen; sweet cream at 44 cents a pound; hens at 23 cents; hogs, on the St. Louis market, at $11.15; cattle, $14.75; and sheep at $15.25. July wheat in Chicago was $1.08; corn, 92 cents; and oats, 45 cents. Compare those prices with what followed: Top hogs at $2.80 in Kansas City, eggs at 6 to 8 cents, butterfat at 11 cents, wool at 11 cents, wheat at 25 and 30 cents, and corn at 10 to 15 cents.

To be specific, I quote prices from the Daily Drovers Telegram of Kansas City. In December 1932 hogs in Kansas City sold at $2.75, and in January 1933 at $2.80 per hundredweight, while in 1929 they had reached $15. In April 1932 the top price of sheep in Kansas City fell to $3.25, instead of $15, as in April 1929. In the same month the top price of native steers was $7.75 instead of $16.75 in 1929.

Such were the price reductions under the Hoover plan. Special attention is called to these results because of a statement to the effect that tomorrow night, in Lincoln, Nebr., Mr. Hoover is expected to make known his farm plank for the Republican platform of 1936. Of course, I do not know what Mr. Hoover may propose. It is safe to say, though, that it will be quite as clear as a statement which he gave out on the subject of farm relief about a dozen years ago. I quote:

> Evolution of economics as applied to problems of the American farmer cannot be accomplished by legislation, but must be accomplished by scientific investigation of facts followed by application and cooperation of forces involved.

"Clear as mud," you say; and I agree.

But let us get back to a comparison of what took place under the Hoover and Roosevelt farm-help plans. For purposes of comparison I have had compiled by the Division of Statistics and Historical Research of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, United States Department of Agriculture, figures showing average farm prices received by farmers on June 15, 1929, when the Hoover farm plan had its beginning, and on March 15, 1933, the approximate date of its demise.

Then, in addition, and in order to complete the comparison, prices at the beginning and near the end of the Roosevelt plan are given. Never have I seen more startling or convincing figures. Here they are, showing the drop in prices from the start to the finish of the Hoover farm plan and the rise from the latter date to the time the Supreme Court put an end to A. A. A. activities:

From June 15, 1929, to March 15, 1933, average cattle prices fell from $9.67 to $3.42 per hundred pounds, while under the A. A. A. they advanced from $3.42 to $6.14. Hogs under the Hoover plan fell from $9.80 to $3.22, while under the Roosevelt plan they went up from $3.22 to $8.72. Sheep under the Hoover plan fell from $7.86 to $2.18, while under the Roosevelt plan they advanced from $2.18 to $4.21. Corn under the Hoover plan fell from 86.9 cents per bushel to 20.6 cents, while under the Roosevelt plan it went up from 20.6 cents to 53 cents. Wheat under the Hoover plan fell from 86.8 cents to 34.5 cents, while under the Roosevelt plan it advanced from 34.5 cents to 90.1 cents. Oats under the Hoover plan fell from 42.5 cents to 13.7 cents, while under the Roosevelt plan they went up from 13.7 cents to 25.5 cents. Butterfat under the Hoover plan fell from 43.6 cents per pound to 15.1 cents, while under the Roosevelt plan it advanced from 15.1 cents to 33 cents. Eggs under the Hoover plan fell from 26.1 cents per dozen to 10.1 cents, while under the Roosevelt plan they went up from 10.1 cents to 28.7 cents. Wool under the Hoover plan fell from 30.2 cents per pound to 8.9 cents, while under the Roosevelt plan it advanced from 8.9 cents to 23.3 cents. Cotton under the Hoover plan fell from 17.9 cents to 6.1 cents, while under the Roosevelt plan it went up from 6.1 cents to 11.4 cents.

In other words, farm prices under the Hoover plan fell to one-third of what they had been, while under the Roosevelt plan prices were more than doubled. Surely the American farmer does not want any more dark days "Hoovering" over him.

Frankly, and in fairness, I would say that all the losses under the Hoover plan should not be charged to the Farm Board. The robber Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, representing Grundyism and greed, was in part responsible. Just here I digress to say that there can be no complete plan of farm relief which does not include tariff reduction and adjustments. Never was a high protective tariff as indefensible as now, when a restoration of world trade is so greatly needed.

My Republican friends may say that a part of the advance in farm prices under the Roosevelt plan was due to drought. This I concede, if you, with equal frankness, will confess that the imports of agricultural products, such as corn, have been due solely to the 3,000,000,000-bushel shortage of grain caused by drought. Under these circumstances it is surprising that imports have not been greater. Further, I would call attention to the fact that prices had advanced before the drought. Again, it was the drought that demonstrated the value of having in the White House a President who possesses sympathy for and understanding of the farmer. Because of his agricultural program, the actual losses and suffering experienced by farmers were far less than in other droughts more severe and more prolonged. The farmers' livestock was not allowed to starve and die, as had been the case in other droughts. Instead, provisions for purchase were made, feed was provided, and emergency loans authorized to the extent of many millions. Truly it was a new deal.

So much for the past. Today those of us who are, first of all, interested in farming stop to take stock of our strength. How and in what direction should we proceed? What do I, a member of the House Agricultural Committee, have to say? My answer is that in expressing any views I speak for myself alone. No doubt we shall have more helpful and constructive ideas from others.

First, as I see it, this is a time for working rather than weeping; for renewed faith and fight, not for faltering and faultfinding. We are fortunate that if the blow had to be struck agriculture, it was delayed until now, when farm prices are so much higher and agricultural conditions so much better than at the beginning of the Roosevelt administration. In any farm help plan it should be remembered that we are dealing with two groups of very wise men—farmers and the Supreme Court. I mention farmers first, but neither can be fooled.

The first "must" that I mention is that an appropriation sufficient to pay in full every contract signer must be made. This is putting first things first, as the Good Book recommends. [Applause.]

In the next place, the constitutionality of every legislative step should, insofar as possible, be assured. There is a desire for certainty and assurance on the part of producers and all others. It is important that mistakes be avoided.

Any plan should call for cooperation but not coercion. For instance, if land rental as a means for withdrawing land from production is approved, the farm owner should be left free to use the remaining part of his farm as he sees fit. Just here I wish to express my approval of a proper land-rental plan. It means a step in the solution of one of the Nation's biggest problems—that of soil conservation. The fertility of the soil must be saved. We must prevent farm tragedy. As has been written:

Hordes of gullies now remind us,
We should build our lands to stay
And departing leave behind us
Fields that have not washed away;
When our boys assume the mortgage
On the land that's had our toil,
They'll not have to ask the question,
"Here's the farm; where's the soil?"

In addition to land rentals and a soil-saving program, we may, in an effort to repair losses sustained by the Supreme Court decision, consider the farm-allotment or export-debenture plans; strict enforcement of all antitrust laws; means of lowering the cost of production, including prices charged by manufacturers of farm machinery; the levying of small widely distributed processing taxes, the receipts to go directly into the Federal Treasury and later to be appropriated, as needed, for the general welfare or any other proper purpose as the Supreme Court decision seems not to deny; and, finally, I suggest restoration of foreign markets, either by a congressional revision of the tariff or through trade agreements, as advocated by the State Department.

Regardless of what we may think of subsidies, and I wish we could be rid of all "stilts", there is no prospect of complete and immediate clean-up. So just as long as industry, through a high protective tariff, enjoys a thinly disguised subsidy, agriculture is clearly entitled to something effective. Incidentally, industry, if wise, will understand that the well-being of agriculture is to the advantage of all. The Supreme Court, in passing upon the Agricultural Adjustment Act, did not even suggest to Congress any laws which could not be repealed. In that direction, even though comparatively distant, a way is open. Through tariff reductions and reciprocal trade agreements there is suggested a start to reestablish a parity between agriculture and industry.

As to the life and death of the A. A. A., under which farmers received checks amounting to much more than a billion dollars, it might be said that it was truly a great godsend. These checks, which went to pay interest and taxes, made it possible for millions of farmers to hold on, to continue to live on the home farm, until today the outlook is far better for them. Despite the mistakes that were made, and it is freely conceded that neither the plan nor the administration was perfect, I feel that the average farmer is thankful for the benefits which he derived under the Roosevelt plan of farm help.

In reviewing the passing of the measure it is interesting to note that the case which finally resulted in the adverse decision by the Supreme Court had its origin in Boston in October 1933, when William M. Butler and James A. McDonough, receivers of the Hoosac Cotton Mills, refused to pay $81,000 in processing taxes to the Federal Government. Mr. Butler, it will be remembered, is a former Republican Senator from Massachusetts, while Mr. McDonough is the private secretary to Frederick H. Prince, of Boston, railroad financier and one of the country's wealthiest men. I say this to show that the step to be rid of the Agricultural Adjustment Act did not originate in the great food-producing sections of the country, nor was the end favored by farmers.

In conclusion I would make it plain that the farmer is not whipped. He is not whining. Whether the orders be "gee" or "haw", to the right or to the left, or ahead, he is ready for a long and strong pull. It is morning; not noon, not night. There is work to do. Now is no time to "take out." [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, my only purpose in asking for this time is to preface a request for extension of remarks.

A few days ago a young friend of mine who has considerable original knowledge and innate ability and capacity for research placed in my hands an unusual document. It has merit; it is informative and has material which I think every thinking Member of this body will want to read.

I was asked to use it as my own speech. I was unwilling to let my name cover the mental effort of another person, and for this reason I am asking to extend my own remarks by including this material which has been presented to me by a friend who, for personal reasons, prefers to remain unknown. It concerns the subject of aviation.

Whether it is for commercial or financial or industrial or patriotic reasons, every one of us is interested in aviation. This statement, incidentally, also concerns one of the most romantic branches of aviation, one that has the greatest potentialities, perhaps, of any branch at the present time, and that is the autogyro.

For these reasons I hope no Member will feel constrained to object to my request. Mr. Chairman, I renew the request to extend my remarks in the RECORD as indicated.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BEAM). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

Probably at no time in the history of our country have we felt more keenly or urgently the need for new industrial activities and the development of new and useful products or implements which will not only add to our creature comfort, increase our national security, strengthen our resources for national defense, and provide us with more efficient means of accomplishing our daily duties, but will also be the means of relieving more of our fellow Americans from the distressing conditions of forced idleness and dependence on charity which now exist.

Congress has figuratively racked its brain to stimulate national industrial recovery in every way possible, and the soundness of this policy is questioned by no one.

In this connection, and lying in one of the most interesting and, in the world of today, important fields of development open to our imagination—aeronautics—we find a new and radically different development, with probably untold possibilities, worthy of our most serious consideration. It is the autogiro.

Invented 13 years ago by a Spaniard, few of us probably realize that autogiros have now flown somewhere between seven and ten millions of miles with never in all these years a fatal accident due to structural failure of the machine itself. Such a record is so far superior to records achieved by any other form of flying machine as to be almost unbelievable, but true it is. Not only that, but the autogiro as it exists today can land with no forward speed whatever, it can hover in the air like a bird, it can operate from restricted areas, and can be flown by people who could never hope safely to pilot an airplane.

Thousands of our people, including many outstanding aviation authorities, have echoed the famous Thomas A. Edison's statement when he saw the giro fly: "That is the answer." Yet, while all agree regarding its tremendously promising future, autogiro development is proceeding all too slowly at the present time.

The autogiro, in spite of the remarkable flying qualities it already possesses, still needs improvement and perfection along certain lines to achieve the broader field of usefulness it will some day fill. It must be safer, it must carry larger loads, and full knowledge must be obtained of the intricate technical workings of the revolving rotor system upon which the efficiency and flying qualities of the autogiro entirely depend, inasmuch as the autogiro now has no wings whatever.

Only a mere handful of engineers in the entire United States—perhaps a dozen—are experienced in these autogiro problems, a woeful quantity of brain power to tackle such a tremendous task. Only four wingless autogiros have been built here to date—meaning that the invaluable development knowledge and experience gained from actual operations is sadly limited.

The fine military and transport airplanes we have today are the result of experience gained from the designing, building, and actual operating of nearly 100,000 airplanes.

Obviously the situation is clear and the problem an important one, but what to do about it? The answer is extremely simple and logical: First, put the autogiro to work immediately in the fields of utility, and there are many, where it can actually be of invaluable service as it exists today.

Second, expedite and encourage experimental research development in the various governmental departments which are charged with these functions in the science of aeronautics.

The autogiro as it now exists can render valuable service in many fields of utility, both civil and military.

The Field Artillery wants autogiros to replace the obsolete, costly, and vulnerable sausage balloon. Several years ago, as chairman of the House Subcommittee on Military Appropriations, the Honorable Ross A. Collins recognized this need and the potential possibilities of the autogiro. It is a matter of record that he called the attention of Congress and the military authorities to this subject at that time.

It is likewise a matter of record that in February 1935 our Field Artillery formally requested 21 autogiros for these purposes.

It is likewise a matter of record that the French Army, after service demonstrations, is now replacing all sausage balloons with autogiros and is also using them for general army cooperation work.

Our Coast Artillery believes the autogiro is just what they want for observation of fire under certain conditions.

Our Infantry wants to try the autogiro for communications and cooperation work immediately.

Our Cavalry wants the autogiro immediately in connection with their operations with the modern mechanized Cavalry units.

Many of our National Guard units throughout the country are anxious to obtain giros. Some National Guard authorities believe every guard squadron should have at least three of these machines.

Unquestionably this type of aircraft would be extremely valuable in operations of our Army Medical Corps for evacuation of wounded, as well as emergency delivery of supplies and medical assistance.

Our growing and efficient Coast Guard Air Service needs autogiros for certain types of patrol work, which it is believed can be more efficiently accomplished by giro than by any other means.

Our Bureau of Investigation, Department of Labor, wants to try giros for carrying out certain patrol duties with which they are charged.

Our Department of Justice is extremely anxious to obtain autogiros to assist them in the remarkable work they are doing in apprehending dangerous criminals.

Our Bureau of Biological Survey is tremendously anxious to obtain giros to conduct operations which can be accomplished in no other way.

Our Bureau of Meteorology considers them promising for carrying out all-important weather observations.

Our Bureau of Air Commerce would like to put giros in the hands of their field inspectors, their engineering and regulations divisions, thus obtaining actual operating experience, which, strange as it may seem they have never had with this type of aircraft—though this Bureau is specifically charged with the regulation and licensing of autogiros.

Our Navy, if it is to keep abreast of the experiments now being conducted by the navies of all principal foreign powers, should place a reasonable number of autogiros in experimental service operations.

And several other of our Federal departments are anxious to obtain autogiros immediately, believing this equipment will render to them valuable service in the performance of their duties.

Autogiros recently landed on the roof of the new Philadelphia post office, delivering mail from the outlying airport and proving this type of service entirely practical. Chicago, Detroit, Philadelphia, and other cities are intensely interested in this service. The Post Office Department could immediately put such service into effect in some localities. Its development will probably lead to the development of autogiros carrying passengers between outlying airports and central city areas—a valuable addition to our famous air-transport system, an outstanding aeronautical achievement in the world's history.

Turning to research, our National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, handicapped by lack of funds and personnel, has already contributed greatly to autogiro development. Provided with means to carry out the program they desire, this body could not only expedite perfection of the autogiro by several years, but would assure our country a leading world position in this development—which is receiving wide attention in France, England, Germany, Italy, Russia, Japan, and other countries, where autogiros are already actually in use in the armies, navies, and other services.

Our Army Air Corps, by being provided with means to become actively interested in giro engineering development, could not only contribute skillful engineering brains to the problem involved, but could assist in technical development of equipment meeting the ultimate desires of the ground troops, as determined by these ground troops (Artillery, Infantry, Cavalry) from their actual experience and tactics developed in the operations of their initial autogiros.

Our naval air-service engineers could likewise contribute brain power toward the development of this equipment for naval uses.

Lastly, but perhaps most important of all, our Bureau of Air Commerce, if provided with the means, could undoubtedly hasten development of the autogiro to such a point as to open up new fields of civilian aeronautic activity of inestimable value to our industrial well-being.

We all know that our American military aviation industry now depends, and always must depend, entirely upon the Federal Government for its continued existence. Our world-famous air transport industry has in the past, and must for some time to come, depend partially upon Federal Government support for its continued operation. Without this Government support and encouragement the United States would possess neither the outstanding military airplanes nor the outstanding air transport systems of which we are so proud today.

So with the autogiro. If we are to keep pace with its development by foreign powers abroad, if we are to obtain the advantages of its great possibilities in our own industrial life, we must extend to its use and development recognition, encouragement, cooperation, the same as we have done to the airship and the airplane.

The autogiro is neither an airship nor an airplane, but is quite distinct from either. It requires its own specialized engineers, designers, operating and piloting personnel. Our airship and airplane personnel cannot, without proper assistance, perfect the autogiro for us—they cannot in fairness be expected, or asked to do so, for the very good reason that their time is already fully occupied with the multitudinous duties already assigned to them. This can only be done by personnel primarily assigned to and devoted to autogiro development as distinct from airship and airplane development.

How can this program be accomplished? First, by making it possible for every interested Government department to obtain and put to work without delay the autogiros needed and desired to render better service in the performance of its assigned functions. Every congressional committee member can render service in this regard by cooperation with the Government departments under his jurisdiction.

Secondly, by ascertaining that the established Government research and engineering sections (National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, Army, Navy, and Bureau of Air Commerce) have the means and personnel and are devoting their active attention to autogiro development.

Thirdly, by seeing that all future legislation provides distinctly for the autogiro instead of simply for the airship and the airplane.

In addition, in view of the widespread interest in this subject by such a large number of different independent governmental departments, the establishment of a small congressional committee to study this matter is highly advisable. Such a committee could determine and coordinate the needs of all the various departments interested, survey the present state of the autogiro industry, and recommend legislation, if any, needed to properly advance the progress of this new art. Or the subject could be assigned for action by some present standing committee of the House.

One thing is certain: If even 1 percent of our present total aviation appropriations could be devoted to the autogiro, its development will progress with amazing rapidity. Then, in place of an industry which is now so weak it just barely holds the thread of life, we shall have a new industry employing thousands of useful citizens and shall have added an important asset to the strength of our national defense.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN.]

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, according to statistics which I have obtained from the American Federation of Labor, there are about 11,000,000 people out of employment in the United States. Since the decision of the Supreme Court pertaining to the N. I. R. A. the unemployment situation has increased. Large industrial associations and business establishments, such as chain stores, have increased the hours of work and have decreased the salaries of their employees. I have said many times if President Roosevelt had done nothing else in the 8 years he will be President [applause] than to have been instrumental in passing the N. I. R. A., he would go down in history, in my opinion, as one of the greatest Presidents that ever sat in the White House. [Applause.] Of course, we know that he sponsored many other progressive and humanitarian measures which did benefit the laboring people of our country. It is true that all of the legislation which was sponsored by the President did not solve all our economic problems, but if he would have had the cooperation of the big-business men of our country whom he had saved from financial ruin, the unemployment situation today would not be so grave.

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MORITZ. I hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN], and the many friends here who are like him, will be returned to this body for the rest of their lives, because we need them here.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for his friendly remarks, and I hope that he and all the other Congressmen who believe in progressive and humane legislation will be returned to Congress regardless of their party affiliations.

I have said many times that if we could get the majority of the Members of Congress to support humane and progressive legislation, our economic problems would be easily solved.

I firmly believe in adequate pensions for the aged, widows who have dependent children, and all others who cannot obtain employment because of physical disability. Poorhouses and slum districts should be eradicated from the United States. I believe in the public ownership of all public utilities and natural resources. Of course, I believe we should purchase them at a reasonable price and not confiscate them.

I hope the time is not far distant when we will be able to pass progressive and humane laws which will not be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. I believe that the elected representatives of the people should be the ones to determine what kind of legislation should be enacted into law. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BLACKNEY].

Mr. BLACKNEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire at this time to present to the House my observations on the Constitution and the New Deal.

One hundred and forty-eight years ago our forefathers, in the old historical Convention at Philadelphia, adopted the Constitution of the United States, and for a period of 146 years, beginning with the administration of Washington, this great document has been the guiding law of this Nation of ours.

During that time we have developed from a small nation of 13 States and approximately 3,000,000 people to a great Nation of 48 States and 130,000,000 people.

The great purpose of this Constitution was to assert the eternal verities of liberty and justice, and our living generation should pay heed in this respect to the tested wisdom of a mighty past, just as we do to the noble beauty of a gothic cathedral which is not less inspiring because its builders are dead.

Our Constitution, therefore, is enduring because it is the definite expression of a higher law. The Constitution itself only deals in this great principle of government, which remains, to a large degree, unchangeable, and is, in itself, a broad and accurate political philosophy which goes far to state the "law and the prophets" of free government. Our Constitution is enduring, therefore—

First. Because it establishes the doctrine of representative government.

Second. Because it establishes a dual form of government, under which the National Government has certain delegated powers and prerogatives, and "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people."

Third. Because the guarantee of individual liberty through constitutional limitations is clear and definite. Under individual liberty I mean such great principles as freedom of the press, liberty of speech, property rights, and the right to worship God according to the dictates of one's conscience. These rights can never be taken away from the people without amending the Constitution.

Fourth. Because our forefathers wisely imbedded in the Constitution the principle of an independent judiciary. Through the 146 years of constitutional life our great Supreme Court has been the balance wheel of our Government. William Wert wisely said:

> If the judiciary be struck from the Constitution, what is there of any value that will remain; for Government cannot subsist without it.

Fifth. Because our forefathers wisely inserted in the Constitution a complex system of checks and balances seeking to prevent the concentration of power in any one man or body of men.

For 146 years our Constitution has been accepted by the citizens of our country, who had an abiding faith in that great document. Since the advent, however, of the New Deal, with its socialistic and communistic tendencies, a change of sentiment has been manifested among many who have accepted the New Deal doctrines and who look upon the Constitution as an antiquated document. The New Deal philosophy is antagonistic to the Constitution. It appeals to mass psychology and is endeavoring to change the concept of our fundamental law.

The Constitution wisely provided a way by which it could be amended, but the New Dealers, as such, do not desire to change the Constitution by amendment. That way is too slow for them. They would rather adopt the doctrine of nullification, and for that reason have urged and whipped through Congress many bills which are unconstitutional, unwise, uneconomic, and unfair. Congress for the first time in many, many years has become subservient to the President. The old theory of three independent parts of government has been to a great extent annihilated. Our forefathers wisely provided for the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of government, but under the New Deal philosophy the Executive, not being satisfied with performing the functions of his Executive office, has endeavored to subvert the true functions of the legislative department and to make the Congress subservient to the President. For that reason nearly every major bill that has been passed by Congress has delegated to the President new powers, new authority, new rights to create departments, until Congress has fallen from its high estate and become truly subservient to the executive department.

In the case of Schechter Poultry Corporation et al. against the United States of America, known as the N. I. R. A. decision, the Supreme Court wisely decided that the N. I. R. A. was unconstitutional because of the attendant delegation of legislative power and the attendant regulation of intrastate transactions which affect interstate commerce only indirectly.

In the recent Potato Act of 1935 we have an illustration of the New Deal philosophy. This legislation is arbitrary, unreasonable, and uneconomic because:

First. The act attempts to control production of potatoes through a punitive tax of questionable validity.

Second. It is intended to benefit large commercial growers of potatoes, but will harass several million small growers and burden the entire consuming population.

Third. To present excessive costs of many articles of food will be added higher prices for a staple commodity upon which the poorer classes are absolutely dependent.

Fourth. Regimentation of farmers who produce potatoes is compulsory rather than voluntary.

Fifth. Even a small garden patch maintained by a housewife and producing only a few bushels for sale is subject to control.

Sixth. Regulations which will annoy both producers and consumers include requirements that all potatoes must be packed in closed and stamped containers of special design.

Seventh. Provision is made for an army of snoopers through severe penalties imposed on persons who fail to tell of violations by their neighbors.

Eighth. Bootlegging will be unavoidable despite fines up to $1,000 and jail sentences up to 1 year.

Ninth. Buyers of bootleg potatoes are made equally guilty with sellers.

Tenth. An expanded bureaucracy, made possible by blanket authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint officials and employees, without regard to civil-service and classification laws, will meddle in the affairs of some 3,000,000 potato growers.

We have other acts of Congress, namely, the Public Utility Holding Act of 1935, the Tennessee Valley Authority, and the Guffey Coal Act, which, in the judgment of leaders of both parties, are unconstitutional and unsound. But the President of the United States, with the aid of his tremendous majority in both Senate and House, was able to force the passage of these bills against the rights of the common people of this country and clearly against constitutional government.

I am a great believer in the Supreme Court of the United States. To me it is the crowning feature of the Constitution. It has long been the balance wheel of this Government of ours. The right of the Supreme Court to declare an act of Congress unconstitutional, in my judgment, is unquestioned. This great principle was decided in 1801 by Chief Justice Marshall in the famous case of Marbury against Madison, in which case it was determined to be not only the right but the duty of the Supreme Court, under their oaths, to pass upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress. In this decision Chief Justice Marshall used the following very pertinent language, which every citizen today should read:

> Why does a judge swear to discharge his duties agreeably to the Constitution of the United States if that Constitution forms no rule for his government? Thus the particular phraseology of the Constitution of the United States confirms and strengthens the principle, supposed to be essential to all written constitutions, that a law repugnant to the Constitution is void, and that courts as well as other departments are bound by that instrument.

I am particularly opposed to the New Deal efforts to disparage the great Supreme Court; I am opposed to their efforts to belittle the great Constitution of the United States; I am opposed to the New Deal philosophy of nullification by acts of Congress, thus seeking to subvert the Constitution. If constitutional amendments are necessary, then we do not have to use the doctrine of nullification, but the only courageous way is that of using the constitutional method itself, of amendment.

The Republican Party stands flat-footed upon the preservation of the Constitution. It still maintains that it is the greatest political document ever made by man. It still maintains that the happiness of 130,000,000 people rests directly upon the preservation of that great document.

How frequently on the floor of the House have we heard Congressmen, sworn to support the Constitution, attack that instrument bitterly and with malice.

How frequently have we heard these same Congressmen attack the Supreme Court of the United States, willfully forgetting the fact that this Supreme Court during the existence of our Government has been its guiding genius.

Thank God for the Supreme Court, for their wonderful ability and integrity, for their unswerving loyalty to the Constitution. And now some Members of Congress would take from the Supreme Court their right to pass upon the constitutionality of a law of Congress. Who then would have that right? Why Congress, of course, say the attackers of the Constitution.

While I have the utmost regard personally for my colleagues in the House, yet I fear for my country if they and they alone could determine the constitutionality of a law. Who is to blame for the undesirable and unconstitutional laws passed? Why, Congress, of course. Under the whip of the "brain trust" Congress passed many laws unwisely, unthinkingly, and supinely. Why then blame the Supreme Court? The blame belongs to Congress and to Congress alone.

The Supreme Court in the Agricultural Adjustment Act decision recently declared this act of Congress unconstitutional on the ground, among others, that—

> This act invades the reserved rights of the States.

In the language of the Supreme Court—

> The Agricultural Adjustment Act is a statutory plan to regulate and control agricultural production, a matter beyond the powers delegated to the Federal Government. The tax, the appropriation of the funds raised, and the direction for their disbursement are but parts of the plan. They are but a means to an unconstitutional end.

In this decision the Court said:

> From the accepted doctrine that the United States is a Government of delegated powers, it follows that those not expressly granted, or reasonably to be implied from such as are conferred, are reserved to the States or to the people.

In my judgment, the decision of the Supreme Court declaring the A. A. A. unconstitutional was simply a reaffirmation that here in America we live under a constitutional form of government. In these days when men's minds are clouded by every conceivable ism, we should thank God that apart from the political departments of the Government—the legislative and executive—there is one department of government—the judicial—that stands apart from politics.

In conclusion let me state that the Constitution is not self-perpetuating. If it is to survive, it will be because it has public support.

The Constitution of the United States is the final refuge of every right that is enjoyed by any American citizen. The Constitution represents a government of law. There is only one other form of authority, and that is a government of force. Americans must make their choice between these two. One signifies justice and liberty; the other tyranny and oppression. To live under the American Constitution is the greatest political privilege that was ever accorded to the human race. [Applause.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, yesterday on the floor of this House the distinguished gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MOTT] called attention to the fact that the so-called Literary Digest poll which is being taken over the country shows an adverse opinion on the New Deal. In the State of California that poll shows 60 percent against the New Deal, but in the State of California a reregistration is going on. We had a permanent registration law, but a Republican legislature canceled it and started a new registration. I submit that a registration of the voters of a district or a State is a fairly authentic referendum as to their views, and that registration, my friends, today is running two and a half Democrats to one Republican. That is the registration record that California is piling up today in spite of the Literary Digest's unfair questions that make it possible to get an adverse vote.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of California. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. I do not think it is fair to say that the returns show an adverse state of mind. I am not questioning the motives of the Literary Digest, which is a very reputable magazine, as we all agree, but I think the first question is very deceiving. If one more question were asked, as to whether or not the person answering intended to vote for the reelection of President Roosevelt, the result would be different. Furthermore, it is rather unfair to ask a voter what he is going to do in the absence of the other party's convention and the other party selecting its nominee. All other ballots, without regard to the Republican Party, showed that President Roosevelt is receiving from 53 to 55 percent of the votes. It seems to me that this poll is worthy of slight credence, without in any way attacking the magazine or impugning its motives, but making a statement as to what would constitute in the minds of fair persons a reasonable and proper conclusion.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, speaking for California, I merely want to say that I consider a registration the most authentic referendum on the subject that we have.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of California. My time has expired.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. FORD of California. If I have any more time, I will be glad to yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. The State of New York, according to the Literary Digest, is against the New Deal. There were two Congressmen elected in the city of New York 8 weeks ago and they received the largest vote ever given to any candidate on the Democratic ticket for Congress. That was in the Second and the Twenty-second Congressional Districts of New York.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. FORD of California. My time has expired.

Mr. RICH. Oh, the gentleman's time has not expired.

Mr. FORD of California. That is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY].

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, the President of the Philippine Islands has been inducted into his high office. Gratifying it is to many of us that a large congressional delegation attended the induction ceremony. There were many Members of this House in attendance, including the Speaker and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, that committee which has to do with the raising of revenue for the maintenance of our Government. More than once I thought I should like to be a member of that group, sail over the seas, and be present there in Manila Bay on such an auspicious occasion as was epitomized by the inauguration of the first President of the new independent Republic. As I visualized that delegation going over there, and thought of our renewed struggle for economic independence in this country, I wondered how many of that delegation took along with them a history of the life of Alexander Hamilton, the first Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEY. I prefer to yield a little later. The Members will perhaps recall our history, where, after we gained our political independence, Alexander Hamilton persisted it was incumbent upon the new Nation to undertake to establish our economic independence. In this connection he had uppermost in his mind always the foresight to provide for deficits, actual and potential. He proposed the establishment of a center of industry in my State of New Jersey where manufactures would be carried on, but he was sufficiently apprised of the possibility of failure from deficits arising out of operations. How did he provide against deficits? That is a well-known matter of history, and as the Members of this House sailed the seas and went into that land which had been under the protection of the American flag, I wondered if any of them would go out of their way to find out how the Philippine Islands raised a large portion of their revenue. I thought I should like to be in that distinguished party, and for one purpose, namely, to point out the efficacy of the lottery in the Philippines and, at the same time, remind them of its service to our own country in the days of the new Republic. I wondered then and I wonder now if any of them would resolve at this session of Congress to see the light of the way open to us to wipe out our governmental deficits. Would they determine to do what was done under the American flag in the Philippine Islands? Would they declare themselves according to that determination; would they declare for what people want in this country, a national lottery? [Applause.] The delegation of this House, together with a body of Senators headed by Vice President Garner of the United States, sailed on over the seas into China and went into the city of Shanghai; as they did so, I wondered if any of their group, when they viewed the great public buildings of that city, some of them even more beautiful than our own in this great Nation, took it upon themselves to inquire of the Chinese how it was possible for them to erect their outstanding public buildings, models of modern architecture. I wondered if they did.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEY. I yield.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Did the lottery which put up those beautiful buildings in China also bring about the living conditions in China?

Mr. KENNEY. The lottery has improved living conditions in China, as it has wherever it has been instituted. Without the lottery China would not have her enviable buildings. I wondered and still wonder if any of the delegation was moved by this method of raising revenue practiced not only by China but employed at the present time by every known form of government. As our representative delegation came home by way of the Panama Canal, I wonder if any of them looked around there and observed the lottery conducted weekly in the city of Panama. That lottery incidentally is supported and made possible by the patronage and support of our citizens resident in the Canal Zone—Americans. Even you and I and our countrymen in the various States are sustaining and contributing to the lotteries of other foreign countries. There is a drawing down there in Panama every Sunday morning. About $90,000 a week is involved. Sixty thousand dollars goes to awards. A portion is used in expenses, but $25,000 every week goes to sustain the hospitals in the Isthmus of Panama.

I wondered if our congressional delegation learned of this lottery and its operation which assures the maintenance of its hospitals without deficits and fear of their closing for lack of revenue not obtainable from ordinary sources; and if they did, I wonder if they gave thought to wiping out the deficits in our own National Treasury by this means. I wonder now if any of them took along a history of the life of Pitt, the great English Prime Minister. I wonder if they went back with Pitt to the eighteenth century when, with the rest of Europe bankrupt, he, as the financial genius of England, was able to sustain the Empire of Great Britain, even to paying off the Florida colonists, through and by means of his use of the lottery, which, as always with the people, received the support of his people. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEY. Certainly.

Mr. RICH. Does the gentleman believe that the lottery was the means of raising the funds in the Philippine Islands to pay for this party that went to the Philippine Islands? Also, does the gentleman believe that those who went over to see the Philippine Islands on this trip or jaunt would vote for their independence today, if they had it to do over again?

Mr. KENNEY. The gentleman has crowded his questions into one, but I will pick out one and answer it.

Mr. RICH. There were only two questions.

Mr. KENNEY. The lottery funds kept the hospitals open in the Philippine Islands, and there is no fear of their closing. Appalling to relate, however, I was present at a meeting in New York a short time ago where one of the leading physicians of New York City said that unless something drastic was done to raise funds from other than ordinary sources, three of the leading hospitals in New York City would close their doors.

Mr. RICH. I was not trying to say that the raising of funds for hospitals was not a good motive, but I wondered whether the raising of the funds in the Philippine Islands by lottery was the means they took to pay for the jaunt that the Members of Congress had to the Philippine Islands.

Mr. KENNEY. The gentleman knows differently, I believe. All the moneys collected in the Philippine Islands from the lottery go directly for charitable purposes. The moneys which were expended for our delegation, through the generosity of the Philippine Government, were raised from other sources. Sources of revenue are drying up, however, and our sources are well-nigh exhausted. So, I may say also to the gentleman and to the Members of the House, since we must be looking about for a new source, that when the First Congress met—and this reminder may come as a telling rebuke—when the First Congress met under the Constitution in the city of New York at the invitation of that city, repairs and additions to the City Hall were made necessary. After they were done, there was a deficit remaining of something like £13,000, or $65,000. There was no way of raising this money from ordinary sources. So the city went to the legislature of the State, obtained permission to conduct a lottery, and thus the deficit was readily met.

To make up the deficits we are incurring and to reduce the ever mounting national debt, are we going to break the broken backs of our taxpayers with more taxes, or are we going to do as has been done in our greatest emergencies, harness the huge supply of treasure which is open to us by the popular and much desired lottery? [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON].

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, one of the vital problems facing this session of Congress is the enactment of farm legislation. As far as I can learn, there is a disposition on the part of every Member of Congress to assist agriculture, but even with this sentiment it will no doubt be weeks, and possibly months, before a bill can be drawn and enacted into law. In the meantime, I believe there are three things this Congress can do that will not only temporarily assist but be of permanent value.

Shortly after the Supreme Court decision in regard to the constitutionality of the A. A. A., my colleague, Hon. CLIFFORD HOPE, of the Seventh District of Kansas, introduced H. R. 9968, which provides for the making of rental and benefit payments to farmers who have made crop-adjustment contracts with the Secretary of Agriculture. The farmers made these contracts in good faith, and this resolution provides that where compliance can be made previous to January 6, 1936, the obligation on the part of the Government should be paid. This is a moral obligation on the part of our Government, and I hope this bill can be reported shortly by the Committee on Agriculture for consideration by the House. In conferring with many members of both parties I have yet to find one that is not in favor of the passage of this resolution. The immediate passage of this would materially assist the farming sections of our Nation.

Second. The farmers, through a crop-reduction program, have taken 30,000,000 acres of land out of production during the past year, and should have the cooperation of the Federal Government by limiting importation of agricultural products, of which we produce a surplus. Surely no one can consistently ask the farmers to curtail production on the one hand and on the other hand encourage the importation of farm products through reciprocal-trade agreements. Let this has been the policy of the present administration. In the recent reciprocal-trade agreement with Canada our farmers' home market is opened to world competition through the favored-nation clause, which automatically grants to all competing countries, except Germany, the same concessions we have made to Canada. Statistics show we have no shortage of cattle or beef products, but the records show we imported last year 230,581 head of cattle and 7,346,000 pounds of fresh beef and veal. The dairy farmers are not getting cost of production, and yet we imported 22,710,000 pounds of butter last year. Our farmers took out of production approximately 5,000,000 acres of wheat land, and the records show we imported 28,085,000 bushels of wheat. During this same period we imported 34,630,064 bushels of corn. All of these imports were brought into this country previous to the making of the Canadian reciprocity agreement. No one can foretell what our farm imports might be with this treaty in effect and a favored-nation clause.

It is unfortunate that the Secretary of State, Hon. Cordell Hull, dismisses the importation of farm commodities with the statement that the percentage of imports is small compared to the total of the products produced in the United States, and leaves the inference that the amount is so small that it makes little difference. Using this same argument, it might be said that despite the fact that we have 10,000,000 unemployed in this country, it would not be objectionable to admit several thousand alien laborers or admit them on a quota basis. No one would seriously consider this, yet it is what we do for agriculture.

To protect agriculture we should immediately rescind the Canadian reciprocal-trade agreements and other similar trade agreements.

Third. The Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Interior, through the Reclamation Service, should have a coordinated land-use policy. The Department of Agriculture has embarked upon a program of land-use curtailment, while on the other hand the Reclamation Service has, through great Federal appropriations, adopted a policy of bringing into use several million acres of arid land through the application of water by the construction of reservoirs. I am not opposed to all reclamation work, but I am opposed to spending hundreds of millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money in order to bring into production strictly arid land. There are many sections of semiarid land in our country that should be taken care of before vast new areas of arid land are opened up. In an article appearing in the Spokane Chronicle of December 25, 1935, it was suggested that many States in the United States were being indirectly benefited by the construction of the Grand Coulee Dam and reclamation project through expenditures for products used in its construction. It was interesting to note in this article that the State of Kansas received benefits totaling $10.73. In view of this benefit to the State during the period of construction, I am wondering what the loss will be to the farmers of Kansas when 1,200,000 acres of fertile soil come into production. This is one of the many projects under construction, and I believe Congress should limit the expenditures for reclamation work until we have a definite coordinated plan of land use.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CARLSON. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I find in the announcement of brokers representing certain processors of the country that since the Supreme Court decision these processors are insisting and demanding that the retail grocerymen pay the processing tax to them on their invoices, which taxes have been held illegal. If this money is thus collected, does the gentleman agree with the proposition that this money might be used for the purpose of meeting these unfinished contracts?

Mr. CARLSON. I certainly am not in favor of returning it to the processors.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The gentleman means by the retailer?

Mr. CARLSON. Yes.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the newspapers of the morning carry some exceedingly interesting information. The Secretary of the Treasury seems to have told a committee of the Senate that during the next 17½ months we must finance something like $11,300,000,000. On yesterday the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations revealed some very startling figures which interested me, because on the floor of this House last year on several occasions I quoted figures showing that the national debt in 1937 would be about $40,000,000,000. At the time this seemed to be an extravagant statement, but my prophecy now appears to be borne out by others, and even sooner than I expected.

Before I forget it I wish to comment on a question which was presented to the House this afternoon. Who were the bankers who told the President of the United States that this country could stand a debt of $50,000,000,000 or more? Who were those anonymous bankers whom the President refuses to name or whom up to this time he has not named? We must assume that there were such bankers. We must take the President at his word, and in the absence of real information we may look back and see what bankers might possibly have said it. On the floor of this House last year I stated that, under questioning by the Committee on Banking and Currency, one very prominent banker did say to the committee:

I do not worry about a debt of $40,000,000,000.

This man now, Mr. Chairman, is the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board and probably the chief adviser to the President on financial matters.

Are we to be blamed for assuming that he was one, at least, of those bankers who so advised the President of the United States? Is it wrong sometimes to assume things which appear to be logical? Is it wrong to assume, as some of us did on the floor of this House yesterday, that the Federal Communications Commission, appointed by the President, might have taken the advice of the big generals of this administration when they made an important decision with reference to political broadcasting? Is it not to be expected that we would assume this without making definite charges? No; we have at least the right of assumption sometimes; and in the absence of definite information, certainly we have a right of assumption when it is based on good reasons. Naturally we have cause to think it highly probable that consultations were held with political strategists in a matter of this nature.

The ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], brings in figures that are most startling. In 1933 we gullible Congressmen, believing that the expenses of the country were going to be cut 25 percent, voted for the economy bill.

In 1933 we had statements from the President himself giving us assurance that if this Economy Act were passed there was reasonable prospect that within a year the income of the Government would be sufficient to cover the expenditures of the Government. That was the "long-range planning", of which we have heard so much. Yet a message was received only about 10 days ago, when the Budget was presented, stating that the deficit this year would be $1,500,000,000. Of course, the decisions of the Supreme Court and the bonus, taken together, will set it back about $3,000,000,000 more; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] yesterday, in presenting his figures, said this:

I think it is safe to say that the appropriations asked for by the Executive for relief will not be less than $3,500,000,000.

So the total deficit for the fiscal year 1937 will be $6,866,000,000—not $1,500,000,000. The country was to have been reassured by believing that the deficit would be $1,500,000,000, whereas now figures which really can be depended upon show it will be $6,866,000,000.

The gross debt at this time is about thirty and one-half billion dollars, exclusive of the bonus. Taking into consideration the bonus to be payable in 1937, counting a deficit of three and one-half billion dollars for 1936, at the end of 1937 there will be a debt of $40,000,000,000. The Congress spent more than $10,000,000,000 last year, which was about $6,000,000,000 more than we knew we could raise. When and where was that $6,000,000,000 to be accounted for, when the country was told we were in debt only thirty and one-half billion dollars? That was the indebtedness for loans outstanding at the moment only. But there were $10,000,000,000 to be spent, and much will have to be financed very, very soon after that statement was made.

Now we find it. There seems to be a deficit of three and a half billion dollars for 1936, which, in conjunction with the bonus, will create a debt at the end of 1937, as is stated, of about $40,000,000,000.

Now, ridicule, if you can, the figures we gave you a year ago when we talked about a $40,000,000,000 debt. And the end is not yet! I do hope that those bankers of the country will either confess, or we may be told who they were, because those from whom we have heard in the past have advised that a debt of $40,000,000,000 is a highly dangerous one. Now, Mr. Morgenthau states that in the next 17½ months he will have to borrow $11,000,000,000, or more. We have been canceling the long-term bonds because of the higher rate of interest. We have been getting money for 10 years at the rate of 2½ percent. If we are to continue to pile up the debt, and the public is fully informed as to what has transpired, especially in the last 2 weeks, will it help the credit of the country? Will they continue to be able to sell 10-year bonds at 2½ percent? Extremely doubtful! When, as happened this morning, there are recorded on the floor the names of many prominent Democrats of the country who are criticizing the New Deal, I say, "Page Lewis W. Douglas" on the financial phase of the Government. He should know. What does he say? If you have not acquired the last two or three issues of the Atlantic Monthly, you certainly should do so. Buy those numbers and read what Lewis W. Douglas, the man the administration trained in the budgetary and financial affairs of this Government, has to say about the present financial conditions.

Is business really confident? Are the banks now loaning money freely? There were $49,000,000 less loaned last week to business than the week before. There is plenty of money in the banks, but the graph shows no increase in loans, but a constant increase in reserves. To be sure, business is better, but that is in spite of present inimical legislation rather than the result of assurances of helpfulness.

We find here today in this bill a request for a large sum of money for the Securities Commission, of which you on the other side boast so much. I do congratulate the President on the selection of its personnel, for much consternation might have resulted if it had been more radical. I have looked through these hearings and I find the answer to a most important question is not there.

About $5,000,000,000 has been presented for registration with the Securities Commission. How much of that has been for new business? We shall find that nearly all has been for refinancing and taking advantage of these low-interest rates. At the end of the first 6 months of the past year, as I recall it, about a billion and a quarter of registrations had been received, but less than $30,000,000 of that was for new activities.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, follow this business graph and it will be seen that in the summer of 1932 business greatly increased. An election was coming on, however. The graph goes down. Of course, all elections cause business disturbance to some extent. Then there came the fateful interregnum from November to March. I shall wish to say much more about that later. Recall those fateful 4 months after a new President had been elected. Nobody knew what he would do, and he was silent; oh, so silent! If the country had not met with that tremendous setback, there would not have been any such unhappy situation as existed in March 1933. It can be likened to the 4 months which followed Abraham Lincoln's election. He could not take his seat until March. Recall the happenings of those 4 months!

In March 1933, after the President made the speech asserting that he would balance the Budget in a year and income would equal the disbursements, business took an abrupt upturn until the middle of that year. Then the graph goes down, and since then there has been a very slow upturn—this despite existing threats of punishment, with merely "breathing spells", permitted at the whim of the ringmaster. Gradually we are getting used to these things, however, and business, heartened by the Supreme Court, goes slowly ahead. After all, little businesses feel that they are closely related to big business.

They rather feel they are second and third cousins to big business, and they take the cursings as though they were meant for them, too. They are frightened. The Democrats say, "Do you want to go back to March 1933?" No; we do not. No one knew where we were then; not the Democrats themselves. They knew absolutely nothing of their leader's plans or his abilities. The country did not know. Such a question is ridiculous. It is not an argument.

Mr. Chairman, I rose at this time just again to remind the Members of the House that we are approaching a national debt of $40,000,000,000 and to justify the figures which I gave a year ago. I suggest also that it would not take many guesses to determine who at least one of the great bankers was who told the President not to worry about a forty or fifty billion dollar debt. [Applause.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH].

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the House to that which is already recorded so fully in the newspapers this morning and this afternoon with respect to the untimely death of air-line passengers and the pilot and copilot and stewardess of a plane on a westward journey from New York to Los Angeles, the tragedy occurring last evening in Arkansas, and taking a toll of lives to the extent of 17 persons, making it perhaps the greatest tragedy in the history of American commercial aviation.

I call attention this afternoon to this tragedy simply for one purpose. Those who have pioneered in science, industry and business in this country and in the world have always had to stand out in the forefront and take their chances of success or failure. Those who fought their way westward over this country in the early days when we pioneered through the mountain passes and over the plains had their toll of death. Those who pioneered across the waters and beneath the seas have also had their bitter experiences.

Commercial aviation in America and in the world today has been dealt a stunning blow, but only temporarily so, because in the future those who are charged with carrying on this great industry will continue to so improve the planes in which men and women fly, so improve the airports where the planes land and take off, and so improve all conditions necessary to successful continued progress in aviation that they will lessen greatly the number of casualties just as those who pioneered in railroad transportation were called upon to do.

I have been deeply interested just now in reading the figures from American Airlines officials in New York City showing that 186,000,000 passenger-miles have been flown by this company until last night without a single accident; and that 240,000 passengers in the last year and a half have flown over this line without a single fatality.

I comment on this tragedy with its lesson for us as Members of Congress to encourage in every way, and not discourage, these improvements and the advancement that will take away from commercial aviation in this country certain of the hazards and dangers which still exist.

The pilots of progress in this outstanding transport system will continue to cary it forward, and especially in America do I feel we shall lead the way in continued improvement and success in this great industry. Not only the pilots who fly the planes but all those connected with this great enterprise are truly pilots of progress in the onward march of American civilization.

How prophetic are the lines written in 1842, almost a hundred years ago, by Tennyson when he said:

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye can see,
Saw the vision of the world and all the wonder that would be;
Saw the heavens fill with commerce, argosies of magic sails,
Pilots of the purple twilight, dropping down with costly bales.

[Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, as one of the gentlemen here has said, "Where are you going to get the money?" I think this is probably the best way for me to begin and end any address that I may make here, because I want to impress it upon the minds of the Members of the Congress. Again I say, where are you going to get the money? [Laughter and applause.]

I want to call the attention of the Members of the Committee at this time to the address made by the President of the United States on January 3, 1936, at 9 o'clock p. m., in the House of Representatives before a joint session of the House and Senate, in which he stated:

We are about to enter upon another year of the responsibility which the electorate of the United States has placed in our hands. Having come thus far, it is fitting that we should pause to survey the ground which we have covered and the path which lies ahead.

I want to call the President's attention to some of the ground he has covered, and then I am going to suggest something with respect to the path that lies ahead.

"Consistency, thou art a jewel." I have always been interested in any man when he points out a particular road to travel and then travels it himself, but I certainly lose my respect for an individual when he points out a road to travel and then takes another course.

I wish to read to the Members of this Congress extracts from the message to Congress by President Roosevelt on March 10, 1933:

The Nation is deeply gratified by the immediate response given yesterday by the Congress to the necessity for drastic action to restore and improve our banking system. A like necessity exists with respect to the finances of the Government itself, which requires equally courageous, frank, and prompt action.

For 3 long years the Federal Government has been on the road toward bankruptcy.

For the fiscal year 1931 the deficit was $462,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1932 it was $2,472,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1933 it will probably exceed $1,200,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1934, based on the appropriation bills passed by the last Congress and the estimated revenues, the deficit will probably exceed $1,000,000,000 unless immediate action is taken.

Thus we shall have piled up an accumulated deficit of $5,000,000,000.

With the utmost seriousness I point out to the Congress the profound effect of this fact upon our national economy. It has contributed to the recent collapse of our banking structure. It has accentuated the stagnation of the economic life of our people. It has added to the ranks of the unemployed. Our Government's house is not in order and for many reasons no effective action has been taken to restore it to order.

Upon the unimpaired credit of the United States Government rests the safety of deposits, the security of insurance policies, the activity of industrial enterprises, the value of our agricultural products, and the availability of employment. The credit of the United States Government definitely affects these fundamental human values. It therefore becomes our first concern to make secure the foundation. National recovery depends upon it.

Too often in recent history liberal governments have been wrecked on rocks of loose fiscal policy. We must avoid this danger.

It is too late for a leisurely approach to this problem. We must not wait to act several months hence. The emergency is accentuated by the necessity of meeting great refunding operations this spring.

We must move with a direct and resolute purpose now. The Members of the Congress and I are pledged to immediate economy.

I am, therefore, assuming that you and I are in complete agreement as to the urgent necessity, and my constitutional duty is to advise you as to the methods for obtaining drastic retrenchment at this time.

I am not speaking to you in general terms. I am pointing out a definite road. * * *

Remember, this was the President's address of March 10, 1933.

WHERE WILL YOU GET THE MONEY?

I wish to call the attention of the Members to the fact that the deficit of the Federal Government on June 30, 1934, was $3,989,000,000; that the deficit of the Federal Government June 30, 1935, was $3,575,000,000; the deficit on June 30, 1936, estimated to be $3,234,000,000; and the estimated deficit, according to the President's message, for June 30, 1937, is to be over a billion ninety-eight million dollars. This does not include anything for relief nor does it include the bonus bill passed by this House several days ago, amounting to $2,000,000,000.

The attention of the Members of Congress is called to the fact that the expenditures from July 1, 1933, to June 30, 1937, are estimated to be $28,879,000,000, and the receipts about $16,981,000,000. That will leave an operating deficit of $11,898,000,000; and for work relief for 1937 about a billion dollars, estimated; and for the soldiers' bonus payments about $2,000,000,000, estimated; or a net deficit for the 4 years of Roosevelt's administration of $14,898,000,000.

When you think of the expenditures of the Roosevelt administration, what encouragement do you Members of Congress see in the statement made in the President's message of March 10, 1933:

For 3 long years the Federal Government has been on the road to bankruptcy.

And when he said:

I am not speaking to you in general terms; I am pointing out a definite road.

It looks to me as if he must have felt at that time that spending would eventually lead to bankruptcy. In the name of all that is sensible and sane, if the President wanted to criticize expenditure of funds for the 3 years previous to his administration, I wonder what the man thinks of himself and his administration at this time.

Mr. Roosevelt—call him, if you will, the Democratic President, elected by the Democratic Party to carry out the Democratic platform—has fooled every leader of the Democratic Party, the members of that party who are in Congress, and the American people. The Congress should be most careful, in my judgment, in carrying out any recommendations that may be made by him which are, in my opinion, proposed by men not qualified in the affairs of government, men who do not know the value of a dollar, men who do not know how to put 10,000,000 men to work and on the pay rolls of the manufacturing establishments of this country.

At this time I wish to state to the Members of Congress that if you will tax improved machinery, the manufacturers of the Nation will be compelled to absorb this unemployment and the unemployed will be taken care of by the pay rolls of manufacturers, and not by the Federal dole, as at present, and which has created this great national deficit. I so recommend that you take definite action through proper laws overseen by the Department of Labor for the immediate taxation of improved machinery—or mass production, as we call it—in order to get the workers off relief and onto the pay rolls of industry. I have suggested this numerous times in the past several years, but no action has been taken.

Let us pass laws at this session of Congress that will get us out of this deplorable position we are in; let us stop this enormous increase of our national deficit, or we are soon faced with national bankruptcy, and when we are compelled to repudiate our debts then we repudiate all our obligations and America loses its form of government and its freedom.

Where will you get the money? [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICH. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Has my friend introduced a bill to carry out all that?

Mr. RICH. No; I have not; but I understand there are Members on the Democratic side who have. I would introduce a bill, but you know that any bill introduced by me would be thrown into the scrap basket by this majority Congress. If you will get behind a bill of that kind I will do everything I can to help enact it into law.

Mr. McCORMACK. My friend from Pennsylvania is unnecessarily sensitive. My friend has made a constructive recommendation, and whether I am for it or against it I should like to see it introduced. When he makes the recommendation he can introduce a bill, and whether or not it is considered is not his responsibility. I should like to have the gentleman introduce a bill. Will he introduce it?

Mr. RICH. The gentleman from Massachusetts can introduce the bill and I will help him put it through. I would introduce such a bill, but in this Congress it would be scrapped; so why should I waste my time when I know it would not be considered? I am pointing the way to you. [Applause.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE].

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I shall devote the time allotted to me to a discussion of the two farm bills that are pending before this Congress—the Frazier-Lemke refinance bill and the cost-of-production bill. I do not know how it appears to most of you, but to me, as has been stated here, and during all time today and yesterday in this general debate, the thing most urgent for the consideration of the Congress is some kind of farm relief. I do not believe that the people of the United States are much concerned, nor do they give much heed to the attacks made on the President of the United States on the one hand, or on the other of having the political undertaker wheel President Hoover's corpse out here in the well of the House. The people are interested in trying to do something for the farming class in America. I agree with one statement made here this morning by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] when he classified the farming industry as a non-profit-making industry. If there has been anything established in the arguments that have been made in regard to agriculture and the condition in which it finds itself today, that is the outstanding fact.

I have been getting a lot of letters and telegrams from down in my country. It is a farming district. Everyone in that district is either a farmer or directly interested in farming. This Congress does not want to imagine itself secure by any means in ignoring their demands for recognition here. There are only about 30,000,000 farmers in America, or people interested in farming, and the people of America, according to my judgment and the contacts I have had with them down in my portion of the world, are losing confidence in parliamentary legislation, and they are losing it because of the attitude that the Congress as a rule assumes.

Democracy is regarded down there as a mockery, so far as the accomplishments of Congress are concerned. I do not care whether a man is a Democrat or a Republican. The people are not interested in your politics, but they are interested in the thought that you have and the votes that you cast in this House.

We have had this Frazier-Lemke refinance bill here for a number of years, I am told, and you cannot blast it out of the committee because of various arguments made in regard to inflation. We have had the cost-of-production petition filed here for nearly a year. We cannot get signers to that program because of that same conservatism. I do not blame a man for being conservative, but I do say this, that in the Congress of the United States the people have a right to a hearing, and you are not giving it to them. [Applause.]

I make this observation, that after having talked with the representatives of this bunch of farmers which have been assembled in Washington for the last week we had better mind just what we are going to do in Congress. I am a Democrat. I agree with you as strongly as possible that the country ought to insist upon and demand the reelection of President Roosevelt—not so much because, perhaps, of his standing on this farm legislation, but the people of America have confidence in the humanitarian aspects of the man. I believe the people know that if the administration was behind this farm program you could get consideration of it. No consideration has been had, and probably none will be had unless we reconsider what we are doing now.

Where do we find ourselves? The Democratic platform in 1932 provided for the cost of production, the very bill that we are trying to petition out here now. For some reason or other, I do not know why, the President ignored it; and the Republican platform in 1932 provided for a control of production. That was the Triple A, and the Democratic administration operated under the triple A and the Supreme Court held it unconstitutional. We now hear rumors to the effect that a committee is going to report another bill providing for a reduction program in agriculture. If they do, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Triple A bill, we are facing a head-on collision again. Why not adopt something sensible and reasonable, in which there is a hope of having it sustained on constitutional grounds?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MASSINGALE. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Does the Frazier-Lemke bill provide relief for the home owner in the city?

Mr. MASSINGALE. No.

Mr. McCORMACK. Why not?

Mr. MASSINGALE. I am talking about the cost of production.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman did refer to the Frazier-Lemke bill.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. That does not carry relief for the home owners in the city?

Mr. MASSINGALE. No; but Congress passed the Home Owners' Loan Act and did its best to relieve conditions in the metropolitan areas. Here is the situation the way the farmer views it and the way that I view it. The farmer is down and out. Statistics show that for the last 8 or 10 years he has been operating at a loss. He has not been getting what it cost him to produce his stuff. There is a relief, a promised relief, in this cost-of-production program. I do not see why a Republican cannot come up here and sign these petitions. I hear it rumored around that in 1936 the Republicans are going to have as a part of their platform the cost-of-production plan that the Democrats had in 1932. Here is the way this thing will operate, according to my information. If we adopt the cost of production as an aid to farmers, then the farmer will get for the stuff that he produces for domestic consumption in the United States what it costs him to produce it on the basis of a proclamation of the Secretary of Agriculture.

In addition to that, he will have surplus crops. He can take those surplus crops and do what he pleases with them, or the Government of the United States can do it with appropriate provisions in the law. If these hard-pressed New England industries or textile mills of the country are complaining, the Government can dispose of that surplus cotton, for instance, to those mills at such a price as will put them on their feet and let them compete with the textile manufacturers of other countries in the world. There is no reason why we should not try to do something for this class of farmers, and the Democratic Party is going to be held responsible for it if we do not. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE] has expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK].

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, while we are in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union I want to call attention to the Members of Congress who are always here, and to the country at large, that we have a great number of citizens in this country in great distress. I refer to the American Indians. We have 340,000 Indians in this country today, and while I am speaking to you at least 100,000 of them are almost destitute. I spent about a month with them this summer, and I found a great many families of Indians on the Sioux Reservation living in tents in the cities, eating off the dump grounds.

I made an effort to get some money allocated for the immediate relief of those Indians. I succeeded in getting a commitment of $5,000 for the immediate relief of that reservation. Since that time I understand the Director of the Budget refused to O. K. the expenditure of those transferred funds.

We have declared those Indians to be citizens, yet they are not citizens. This Government, contrary to the wishes of the Indians, has made every Indian who has any allotment under the allotment system of this country and every Indian who is entitled to land under the tribal land grants a ward of the Government, and the Government has assumed to act for him both in the matter of his life and his property. Inasmuch as the Government, as early as 1887, against the wishes of those Indians, deprived them of the right to operate their own business, and they now appear today as wards of the Government, is there any just reason why this trustee of the Indians—the Government—should permit those Indians to starve?

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks to give a full report in regard to this Indian question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, under leave to revise and extend my remarks made on the floor of the House on the subject of the condition prevailing among the Indians of the Northwest, permit me to say that it is my purpose here to give the Members of Congress and the country at large a brief outline of conditions prevailing among the Indians of North Dakota, South Dakota, and Montana as I personally found them to be on my personal visit among them in October and November just passed.

First, may I say that I have lived among the Sioux of Dakota for more than 50 years, and I believe I have a broader acquaintance among them than anyone at present in the city of Washington. In the area of my acquaintance are the Sioux, Mandans, Gros Ventres, Arikaras, Crees, Chippewas, and Blackfeet. The entire population of these tribes numbers about 41,000.

These tribes at one time in the long ago occupied the territory of the United States far to the east, but as the white population pushed over the Allegheny Mountains, and crossed the valleys of the Ohio and the Mississippi, these tribes were driven westward beyond the horizon of the white man's civilization.

During this trek across the continent countless numbers of treaties were made with these Indians, and in every instance the Government of the United States solemnly promised the Indians land to west if they would give up the dominions they then occupied. As soon, however, as the white population reached the "Indian country", reserved for the Indians, they occupied it. Financial pressure was that never ending force which drove our forefathers westward to undergo the dangers of Indian wars and massacres. The Indians were fighting for their homes in the only way they knew—the frontier settlers were fighting for the chance to build a home which they could not do in the East that had denied them the opportunity to own a home.

No sooner was a treaty made with the Government before that Government found a way to either break it or circumvent it.

The Indian department was established in 1832 by an act of Congress, acting under the general supervision of the War Department. Later the supervisory control of Indian affairs was lodged with the Secretary of the Treasury. In 1868 by an act of Congress the supervisory control of Indian matters was placed under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, where it still remains.

In 1871 by an act of Congress all further treaties with Indians were prohibited, but all treaties made prior to that date were validated.

The last great treaty made with the Sioux was made at Fort Rice, Dakota Territory, in 1868, and among other things this treaty provided—

In article 2 that the future home of Brule, Oglala, Minneconjue, Yanktonai, Hunpapa, Blackfeet, Cut Head, Two Kettle, San Arcs, and Santee Sioux should be in that territory described as follows:

Commencing on the east bank of the Missouri River where the 46th parallel of north latitude crosses the same—which would be at or near Fort Yates, Dakota Territory—thence along low-water mark down said east bank to a point opposite where the northern line of the State of Nebraska strikes the river thence west across said river and along the northern line of Nebraska to the 104th degree of longitude west from Greenwich (104th degree)—

The same being the west boundary of Dakota—thence north on said meridian to a point where the 46th parallel of north latitude intercepts the same thence due east along said parallel to the place of beginning.

This provision embraces all of what is now South Dakota and a strip approximately 10 miles wide across the southern boundary of what is now North Dakota. In addition to this tract the Government added thereto all existing reservations on the east bank of said river. And the Government in said treaty said:

And the United States now solemnly agrees that no person except those herein designated and authorized so to do and except such officers, agents, and employees of the Government as may be authorized to enter upon Indian reservations in discharge of the duties enjoined by law shall ever be permitted to pass over, settle upon, and reside in the territory described in this article and in such territory as may be added to this reservation for the use of said Indians, and henceforth the Indians will and do relinquish all claims or right to any portion of the United States except such as is embraced within the limits of the aforesaid.

The territory ceded to the Indians in this treaty included the Black Hills. Gold was discovered there in 1874 and the white prospectors and settlers moved in in violation of this treaty and the Government of the United States was responsible for this trespass.

Another provision of the treaty provided that the Indian should be educated by the United States Government. Article 13 of the treaty provided:

The United States agrees to furnish annually to the Indians the physicians, teachers, carpenters, millers, engineers, farmers, and blacksmiths herein contemplated, and that such appropriations shall be made from time to time on the estimates of the Secretary of the Interior as will be sufficient to employ such persons.

This article does not authorize Congress to appropriate this money with the Indian funds, but it is a direct appropriation during the civilization period of the Sioux Indians, but that provision, as every Congressman knows, has never been kept. The treaty further provided in article 16 that the United States hereby agrees and stipulates that the country north of the North Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains shall be unceded Indian territory, and also stipulates and agrees that no white person or persons shall be permitted to settle upon the same without the consent of the Indians first had and obtained. This provision of the treaty was not kept. The Black Hills were taken away from the Indians absolutely, and they were never paid either for the gold obtained or for the country itself, and after all of this bad faith are we to forget the Indian today when he is starving by following the white man's ways which we have compelled him to follow?

During the entire period in which these tribes were wending their way westward in the vanguard of approaching pioneers, the Indians were in the main treated as prisoners of war or as fugitives from justice. Whole communities of Indians were broken up, their land taken away from them, and they were transferred to distant parts of the United States and compelled to live in reservations, far from their native haunts. Longfellow's story of Acadia was enacted time without number among the very tribes of whom I now speak. The deliberate and uncalled-for transfer of the Idaho Indians under Chief Joseph from their native homes in Idaho to Indian Territory is more pathetic to read than the story of Acadia.

In 1887 the allotment system of handling Indian lands and Indian lives was adopted through an act of Congress. Allotments of land in reservations were made to the Indians, but the control of that property and the control of the lives of the Indians was not left to the Indians, but assumed by the United States Government. Today in the "Indian country" the Federal courts of the United Sates have complete jurisdiction of all Indian matters and of all crimes committed within the "Indian country" whether committed by Indians or whites. While the Indians are no longer treated as prisoners of war, they are not permitted to have their independence. An Indian is termed a ward of the Government. He can do nothing—the Government is his agent, his protector, his advisor, his trustee, and the Government, acting through the Bureau of Indian Affairs, is complete master over the destiny of the American Indian.

The Government has assumed this stewardship as guardian of the American Indian. Not only does the Government control the Indians in all of their affairs but the Government controls their money, keeps it on deposit for them, under this trust, and spends it in appropriations by Congress as it sees fit, without the Indians' consent. It is no exaggeration to say that the Government of the United States has expended out of Indian trust funds, to support the machinery that governs the Indian, and against the plain provisions of this trust, more than $500,000,000.

Today the Indians of the Northwest are slowly but surely starving. They live in homes unfit for human habitation, sanitary conditions are at the lowest ebb, and sickness and disease, at least among the Sioux, are allowed to go unchecked.

During the past 6 years one of the unprecedented droughts of history has visited these reservations. Their gardens dried out, and the shortage of grass compelled them to sell their cattle. The pride of ownership of any Indian was his horses, and today on the Standing Rock Indian Reservation the horses have perished, and the Indian is on foot.

In the P. W. A. and the Indian works program, many young Indians have been employed, but even those must measure up to standards of health and fitness. The sick Indian, the aged Indian, the husbandless widows are left to the tender mercies of the Great Spirit.

I found family after family with nothing to eat except a few beans furnished by the agency. Occasionally I saw a small portion of sowbelly, but the rations dealt out for a whole month for a family of five could have been devoured by two hungry men at one meal. The wild fruit, always a source of food for these Indians, failed to mature. Through the anxiety of the Indian Department to do something, the prairie dogs were poisoned, and other wild game such as prairie chickens were destroyed by the same agency. Prairiedog meat has always been a natural Indian menu, and this poisoning process was a serious matter with the Indians.

I visited Indian homes and saw for myself their destitute situation. As far as my means would permit, I fed them, but one Member of Congress cannot feed many distressed Indians. I took up collections among the white people; I wired to the Secretary of the Interior, the Indian Bureau, and the President of the United States, setting forth their deplorable condition. At first these reports which I sent in were denied by some, and the unfriendly newspapers in North Dakota belittled the reports I made and printed statements that I was evidently out canvassing for Indian votes. I found the most deplorable conditions at Bull Head and Little Eagle, S. Dak., among the Hunkpapa Sioux, the bravest of all the Indians on the American continent. I surely could not be looking for votes in South Dakota. I trust I may be given credit for having more political judgment than to be out "cooning" for votes where there are no votes. All the Indian vote in the Northwest would not determine the election of any Member of Congress. No; I made this investigation because I have lived with them for half a century and they are my friends.

I was advised by wire from the Indian Bureau that $5,000 had been made available for the relief of aged Indians on the Standing Rock Indian Reservation. I felt somewhat relieved. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs also made the statement in the press of the country that out of a total Indian population in the United States of 340,000, at least 100,000 were in distress.

That $5,000 has never been sent to the reservation, because the Comptroller General will not O. K. the transfer of the fund from which this money was to come, and the Indians are in more distress than ever.

Foreseeing this condition, and acting upon information received from the Indian Bureau, I introduced in the first session of this Congress a resolution providing for the appropriation of $175,000 as an immediate emergency fund for the relief of these Indians. This was House Joint Resolution No. 263. Nothing more modest in amount could ever have been suggested. The Bureau of the Budget reported to the Committee of Indian Affairs of the House that the resolution was not in harmony with the financial policy of the President, and that was the last of that resolution.

Senator NORBECK, of South Dakota, introduced in the Senate, and Congressman KNUTE HILL, of Washington, introduced in the House a bill to provide $30 per month pension for the aged Indians. This was done for the reason that the social-security bill does not apply to Indians. No general law for relief applies to Indians unless the act itself so declares, and there is nothing in the Social Security Act that makes it applicable to Indians. That bill was also turned down as not in harmony with the financial policy of the President.

While these measures were said to be in conflict with the financial policy of the President, at the same time the Government was building golf courses at Fort Yates for the benefit of the employees of the Indian Bureau. At the same time men from Arkansas were engaged in the important work of shooting jack rabbits in North Dakota. This is not put in here as an idle joke—it is the truth. At the same time, when we had no fund to feed hungry Indians, the Government was building steel towers in North Dakota and erecting on them houses to house observers put there to see that the wild duck were not molested. At the same time the Government was spending money in the building of a scenic highway through the Bad Lands of North Dakota by men armed with picks, shovels, and wheelbarrows. This is still going on and the most modern type of road machinery lies idle. I am just wondering what the key is to the President's financial policy that will approve such nonsensical operations and at the same time will leave 100,000 Indians in distress.

I desire to point out one further fact, and that is that these destitute Indians are wards of the Government, made so through no act of their own. The Government of the United States is their trustee, their protector. The Government cannot escape this responsibility to care for these Indians. They are duty bound to do it because of this trust relationship. It is inhuman to avoid this responsibility. Some way must be found by this Congress now to feed these Indians, to clothe them, to provide them with houses, to take care of them in sickness, no matter what the financial policy of the President or anyone else may be. Some way out must be found to permit and demand that this Government discharge its obligations to a class of our citizens who have been held in subjugation since the beginning of this Government. I will venture this predicition—that if this Government will pay the Indian what is due him under validated treaties and under acts of Congress and let him take care of himself he will be infinitely better off than he is cooped up on a restricted reservation, with all power to take care of himself taken away, while his money is being spent by Congress without his consent, and he allowed to starve by the very agency that is responsible for his helplessness.

We made the Indians citizens of the United States, but we qualified it by saying that he was only a limited citizen. He still remained under the control of the Government. He cannot transact his own business and cannot get his own money until Congress gets through spending it in the grand process of civilizing the Indian.

It surely is a sad commentary to have to say that the first inhabitants of this great country are still under the protecting care of the Government and that when dire need comes that the Government should say it cannot discharge the trusteeship which it has assumed.

It is repudiation of the solemn terms of ratified treaties for this Government to refuse now to make its word and promise good.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CULKIN].

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I asked for this time to discuss an issue that is of vital interest to the welfare of the entire country. I am going to get away from the spirit of partisanship. We have heard a great deal along that line the last few days. Today I wish to discuss the subject of transportation in its related fields. I wish to discuss, within the limits of time allowed me, the attempt that is being made to merge rail and water transportation in the United States and to place it under the complete regulation and jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This is the proposition embodied in Senator WHEELER's bill—S. 1632—which has already been reported from the Committee on Commerce in the other body.

THE PROPOSED MERGER IS VICIOUS

I desire to voice my vigorous objection to the suggested procedure. The prime necessity of America today is adequate low-cost transportation. In some sections of our country we have great surpluses of products of the farm and factories for which there is no market. In other sections there is distress because of the need of these commodities which cannot be transported to the area where they are needed by reason of the prohibitive, and, I may say, excessive costs of transportation. It is my honestly considered opinion that the development of our internal waterways and of our coastal harbors is now beginning to solve this acute and distressing problem. A feature in this solution is the 3,000,000 miles of public roads and highways which we have improved. Over these the development of transportation by truck is already furnishing a needed and necessary method of transportation.

We have about 15,000 miles of canalized rivers suited to navigation within these United States. I am informed that we have 250,000 miles of railroads in the country. As at present constituted, these various methods of transportation are not meeting the problems of the people. May I say that I am somewhat familiar with these problems. I have served on the Rivers and Harbors Committee for 8 years and have been fairly diligent in my attendance at all hearings. I have come to know the national picture and have been greatly impressed with the measure of relief which water transportation has brought to the people.

PRESENT RAILROAD RATES DESTRUCTIVE OF NATIONAL INTEREST

I am firmly convinced from my examination of the subject that the present rate structure of the railroads is a definite and complete handicap to the farmer and industrialist who wishes to get his goods to the market. As time has gone on, these railroad rates have become more and more oppressive. I have in mind sections of the East and West which are virtually marooned where water transportation is not present by reason of the fact that the freight rates on the product to the large metropolitan markets are greater in amount than what the farmer receives for his produce.

I have in mind certain areas of the West, where it costs more to carry a bushel of wheat 100 miles than the wheat is worth. Congress has attempted to solve this vital and growing problem by the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission and has granted to this body certain quasi-judicial powers.

I do not wish to cast any aspersions on that body, but it is obvious to all who have looked the situation in the face that the Interstate Commerce Commission has definitely become railroad-minded. It has forgotten the purpose for which it was created, and I am somewhat of the opinion that it were as well if this body had never been created. Edmund Burke once said that "refined policy was the parent of confusion." The present situation of the railroads is an evidence of that. It may be that the railroads, by reason of the sins of the past and the fact that they were once subject to the financial piracy of the Jay Goulds and Jim Fisks of a past generation, are in fact suffering from a condition for which there is no cure. The management of the railroads since the creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission have remained moribund and have been content to make an annual pilgrimage to the Interstate Commerce Commission, where they asked for and usually received an increase in freight rates.

RAILROADS HAVE HAD GENEROUS SUBSIDIES

America owes much to the railroads, but America has been and is being good to the railroads. I mention this in connection with the claim that the waterways of the country are being subsidized by the Government. According to the records of the Interior Department, Federal land grants to the railroads have amounted to 158,293,376 acres. The value of this land is indicated by the fact that much of it was located in such States as Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, and Kansas. The monetary value of this land, plus the donations from other sources by localities, both State and townships, amounts to the handsome sum of $950,000,000. They have had the use and enjoyment of these gratuities for over 60 years. At 4 percent simple interest the present value of these railroad bonuses is over $3,000,000,000. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation since its inception has loaned the railroads approximately $400,000,000. The repayment of much of this is doubtful. We are paying many millions of dollars in subsidies on mail contracts to the railroads.

WATERWAYS ARE EFFICIENT

It is my honest judgment that waterways are today giving substantial service to the people at a greatly decreased cost. The cost of maintaining all of the rivers and harbors is annually about $25,000,000, and represents a cost of about 3½ cents per ton of commerce. The cost of maintaining the railroads ranges from one billion to one and a half billion dollars per year, as stated by the Interstate Commerce Commission. This represents an average cost of $1.50 per ton of freight handled. The railroads, according to Chairman Eastman, are carrying a capitalization of approximately $24,000,000,000. One billion of this structure represents the capitalization of public gifts. It is fair to state that due to the part that the financial piracy of the olden days played in the railroad management that $6,000,000,000 is water and never went into property at all. Much of the railroad property has been permitted to become obsolescent; yet the public, in the theory of Mr. Eastman, is supposed to pay freight rates based on this exaggerated and fantastic capitalization.

I am fully aware that the investment in bonds of the railroads make up a considerable part of the investment of banks, insurance companies, and investment trusts. I realize that many widows and orphans are dependent upon their income from this source. But I do not believe that investments in this type of security are threatened by any write-down of railroad valuation.

The fact is that America will be tied hand and foot if we permit the present policies of the Interstate Commerce Commission to include water transportation. The rates fixed by this body carry in themselves the seeds of destruction of the railroads. I am in strong sympathy with the type of investors I have described. I am in strong sympathy with the men who are employed on the railroads of America. For the protection and future of all concerned it is vital that there should be some write-off in the present volume of securities. For myself, I am willing to vote proper Federal aid to the railroads, but I am unwilling to weigh down water transportation with the past sins of the railroads and to consign them both to ruin and destruction.

WATERWAYS DO NOT INJURE RAILROADS

Both water and rail transportation should be kept independent, and there should be no monopoly in transportation. Judge MANSFIELD, who is chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House and an expert in the field of waterways, has repeatedly stated on the floor of the House that waterways do not injure the railroads. He has stated that 90 percent of the harbors that were improved in America were improved at the request of the railroads themselves. The city of Pittsburgh is evidence of the fact that movement by low-cost water transportation resulted in the building up of one of the greatest industrial and railroad centers on the American Continent.

The fact is that every locality in America that is alive to the situation is against the proposed merger. And the record displays an absence of abuses of water transportation such as call for a remedy through regulation. On the contrary, the record shows that the public which furnishes the tonnage and pays the freight urges that this legislation be not passed.

FARMERS AND BUSINESS OPPOSE MERGER

The great farm organizations, such as the American Farm Bureau Federation, the National Grange, the Northwestern Farmers Union, the Farmers National Grain Corporation, and the American Cotton Cooperative Association, are fighting tooth and nail against this proposed merger. The fact is that every organization of shippers in the United States and many representatives of organizations of commerce and industry have presented facts and arguments which justify the defeat of this measure when it comes to the floor of the House. Nor should anyone be surprised at the popular uprising against the proposed legislation.

Mr. Fred Brenckman, Washington representative of the National Grange, in an article in the January 1936 issue of the National Grange Monthly, protests in the name of agriculture against this unholy alliance. It is his view that the enactment of this measure into law inevitably means the increase of charges of water-borne commerce to or near the level of what the Commission considers normal rail rates. Mr. Brenckman goes on to state:

> Such increases in water rates must be drastic or the obvious purpose will fail. All of this extra burden will have to be borne by the shipper and consuming public. All water carriers and the public benefits resulting from their service will be thrown into the discard.

RESOLUTION OF THE NATIONAL GRANGE

The last annual convention of the National Grange, held in Sacramento, Calif., in November 1935, adopted a resolution in opposition to the so-called water carriers' bill. The resolution in full reads as follows:

> Whereas the so-called water carriers' bill, introduced at the last session of Congress, would subject all common and contract carriers by water operating on our inland waterways and in the coastwise trade to the absolute domination of the Interstate Commerce Commission, giving the Commission wholly unwarranted powers that are intended to be used for the benefit of the competitors of the water carriers and not in the interest of the people as a whole; and
> Whereas agriculture has a vital stake in the matter, since millions of tons of grain and other farm products find their way to market by water, not to mention farm implements, machinery, and other supplies and equipment that farmers buy, and which are transported by boat: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National Grange go on record against the enactment of this proposed legislation, which is without a counterpart in any other nation in the world.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. In the course of the gentleman's remarks or his extension will he point out, apropos of what he has been saying, what good purpose will be served if, after completion of the construction of waterway transportation, through mergers or through some other elimination of competition, instead of reducing rail rates or making available water transportation, water rates are lifted to a point where the construction of waterways is ridiculous and futile?

Mr. CULKIN. The gentleman's request is very pertinent. If this iniquitous merger is accomplished, water rates will be raised to the general level of freight rates. No one has any illusions about that who has watched the course of the Interstate Commerce Commission and its findings. It has been the theory of the Commission for many years that they could bring about a rehabilitation of the railroads by increasing freight rates. The fact is that the contrary was true. The freight rates they fixed were so high that the farmers could not pay them and other groups seeking transportation outlets were driven into other modes of transportation. The effect of this merger would be to create a monopoly of transportation which would throttle agriculture and industry. Our salvation so far has been, in large part, the relief afforded by water transportation.

COMPARISON OF RATES

A comparison of rail and water rates will be helpful and illuminating on the point I am attempting to make. For example, the unregulated water rate on grain from Duluth to Buffalo, approximately 1,000 miles, is normally 1½ cents per bushel, or 50 cents per short ton. The rail rate from Duluth to Buffalo, known as a depressed water influenced rate, is 18½ cents per bushel, or $6.16 per short ton. However, from Shelby or Livingston, Mont., to Minneapolis, approximately the same distance, but without water competition, the grain rate is 25 cents per bushel.

The Pittsburgh Steel Co. is now shipping steel products, including rails, wire, and pipe, from Pittsburgh to the Pacific coast and saving $3 a net ton under the usual rail route to the Atlantic seaboard and reshipment by steamer. It came to my notice several years ago when investigating the transportation cost of onions from Egypt, a distance of over 6,000 miles by water, and by rail from my home county of Oswego, N. Y., that the water cost per bushel for over 6,000 miles was less than the rail cost for 360 miles.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Is it not true that a ton of coal can be moved from Buffalo, N. Y., to Duluth, Minn., by way of the Great Lakes for about the same price it would cost one to move a ton of coal from the curb to one's cellar window, or about 50 cents? This could not be done by rail.

Mr. CULKIN. I think that is an excellent illustration. I thank the gentleman for it.

As I said before, I make no war on the railroads. I wish to give them their place in the sun, but their place in the sun will not be gained by a merger with water transportation. Their relief should come from some other source, if need be, even out of the Federal Treasury, but water transportation belongs to the people and is for the people and for the benefit of the people.

Its merger with rail transportation would maroon large sections of the country and destroy them. I speak for a free and unfettered America when I ask Congress to stop this unholy merger. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, this concludes the general debate on this bill. I should like to call the attention of the House to the fact that everyone who has requested time has been accommodated. Several gentlemen on this side of the House who requested time were not here to claim the time, and I understand my colleague from Massachusetts on the other side has had a similar experience. But, lest it should at some future time be said that the Appropriations Committee does not permit Members to talk on the state of the Union, we vouch these facts as evidence that we have tried to be liberal in debate.

I want now to say that tomorrow, as soon as the House convenes and business on the Speaker's table is disposed of, I shall endeavor, if I may, to make a few remarks I hope will be pertinent to the bill. My colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH], and perhaps our colleague from Ohio [Mr. BOLTON], will do likewise, and then we shall hope that the membership of the House will cooperate with us in permitting the bill to go through in the regular and expeditious manner.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I want to say that the gentleman from Virginia has been fair in allowing discussion and handling general debate on this bill. We appreciate his kindness in this matter. [Applause.]

Mr. MORAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 9863, the independent offices appropriation bill, 1937, had come to no resolution thereon.

RESIGNATION FROM COMMITTEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

JANUARY 15, 1936.

Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: With the highest personal regard for the chairman and members of the great committee I have had the honor and pleasure of serving on during 1935, I hereby tender my resignation from the membership of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee because of my election to the membership of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Most respectfully,

SAM HOBBS.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

RETURN OF SENATE BILL

Mr. COOPER of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege of the House and offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 396

Resolved, That the bill (S. 3260) to amend Public Law No. 438, Seventy-third Congress, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver, issue silver certificates, and for other purposes", in the opinion of this House contravenes that clause of the Constitution of the United States requiring revenue bills to originate in the House of Representatives, and is an infringement of the prerogatives of this House, and that said bill be respectfully returned to the Senate with a message communicating this resolution.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NEW DEAL SPENDING AND THE FUTURE TAX BURDEN

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a radio address I made last night.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio January 14, 1936:

Present and prospective taxes will be one of the most important issues in the approaching national election. No question more directly or more vitally affects the Nation as a whole.

The money the Government spends must necessarily be collected from the people in taxes of one form or another, imposed at one time or another. No one escapes their burden. Those taxes which we do not pay directly are hidden in the cost of the things we buy. When the Government resorts to borrowing to meet current expenditures, it does not thereby avoid the necessity of taxes; it merely postpones the evil day.

Inasmuch as the present New Deal administration has been the most prolific spending administration in peace times in all our history, it follows that the taxes which must be imposed to pay for its unprecedented spending must be higher and more burdensome than ever before.

We can only realize the enormity of the administration's reckless extravagance when we consider that it has cost the people as much as was spent during all the administrations from President Washington to President Taft, inclusive. The annual reports of the Treasury Department show that the expenditures of the Government in this 125-year period were $24,521,845,000. President Roosevelt has spent an equal amount since March 4, 1933.

The numerous income and excise taxes now imposed by the Federal Government are only sufficient to pay one-half the cost of the New Deal's profligate spending program. In the first half of the current fiscal year the Treasury has collected $1,902,000,000 and disbursed $3,782,000,000. This practice of spending $2 for each $1 collected in taxes has been going on ever since the present New Deal administration took office and will have resulted in an accumulated deficit of $11,000,000,000 in the 3-year period between July 1, 1933, and June 30, 1936.

With Federal, State, and local tax collectors now taking one-fifth of the national income, the tax burden already is too great. But if we think we are heavily taxed at present, then let us consider what our burden will be when Congress starts levying the taxes necessary to pay for the wild, wanton, and wasteful spending spree of the New Deal. When that day arrives—and it is not far off—we will really have something in the way of taxes to complain about.

Moreover, we may expect this tax load to continue for many years to come. Even future generations will be called upon to help pay for present-day extravagances in addition to assuming the burdens which their own times will bring.

In his annual message to Congress on January 3 the President stated that "we approach a balance of the National Budget" and asserted his "belief" that no new taxes would be necessary. How the President can feel justified in making such a statement I do not know. In the fiscal year 1934 the Budget was $4,000,000,000 in the red; in 1935, $3,600,000,000; and this year's estimated deficit will be in the neighborhood of $3,300,000,000. The President's Budget message for 1937, which has recently been presented, indicates a further deficit of as much as $3,000,000,000. Thus it does not appear that there will be a balance of receipts against expenditures for some time to come.

Every year since he has been in office President Roosevelt has kept postponing the date for balancing the Budget. It has now gotten to the point where he is only willing to say that we are "approaching" a balance. All idea of a definite date seems to have been abandoned.

Even when a balanced Budget has been realized, whether by decreased expenditures or increased taxes, the taxpayers will still have to pay off the accumulated national debt, which now stands at the unprecedented total of $30,500,000,000. It will take more than a Presidential smile to wipe out this tremendous obligation. The interest on the debt alone amounts to $800,000,000 annually, which is more than it cost to run the entire Government when I came to Congress some 23 years ago.

So far as the President's promise of no new taxes is concerned, we have only to recall that he made a similar promise in his annual message a year ago, and then, 6 months later, demanded the enactment of his so-called share-the-wealth tax bill.

In his recent annual message to Congress the President referred to the increasing national income and pointed out that tax receipts based upon that income would increase without increasing the rates. However, it must not be forgotten that a large part of the present recovery is artificial, being based on the New Deal's lavish spending, and that when this spending ceases there will be a consequent shrinking of the national income. The same spending program which has created a measure of artificial recovery has at the same time resulted in a definite drag on real recovery, since it tends to impair the Nation's credit and create uncertainty in the public mind.

The assertion of Democratic leaders that new taxation is unnecessary is as insincere as it is ridiculous. It is being made for purely political purposes, just as the Democratic platform of 1932 was made to run on and not to stand on. The fact is that new and increased taxes are inevitable unless we are going to turn to the issuance of printing-press money, which, by inflating prices to the sky and thus destroying purchasing power, would still be taxation in another and more destructive form.

Taxes are naturally unpopular. No one likes to pay them, and the Democrats don't dare to antagonize the voters just before the election. They want to continue playing Santa Claus and forget all about taxes—at least for the time being. Possibly in the coming campaign we may find them using the slogan "Billions for expenditures, but no new taxes in payment thereof." However, it will be just as false as was the slogan "He kept us out of war", on which President Wilson campaigned for reelection in 1916; then asking Congress to declare war on Germany.

In this connection, it is significant that administration leaders have been careful not to make a definite promise that there will be no new taxes levied after the election. They know better than to do this, because that is when the day for beginning to pay the piper will come. Even if they did make such a promise, their word could not be relied upon in view of their failure to carry out the solemn pledges of their 1932 platform, which they so piously referred to as a "covenant with the people to be faithfully kept by the party when entrusted with power."

Many Democrats are insisting that it would be unwise to balance the Budget at the present time. This is perhaps because of the fact that it would be absolutely impossible to do so at the present level of expenditures, which amount to nearly $8,000,000,000 annually. New Deal extravagance has so run riot that it would necessitate the doubling of the present tax burden, and the people simply could not stand the load. The Democrats have apparently lost sight of the fact that there are two sides to a Budget—the income side and the expenditure side—and that if they can't make their revenues equal their expenditures, they might try making their expenditures equal their revenues.

We may expect the Democrats during the approaching election campaign to use every effort to convince the people that they have been very lenient in the matter of new taxes, but such is not the case. Actually, the New Deal administration has imposed heavy burdens on the taxpayer, particularly on those of small means.

In his Albany speech of July 30, 1932, Candidate Roosevelt said: "Our party sees clearly that not only must government income meet prospective expenditures but this income must be obtained on the principle of the ability to pay. This is a declaration in favor of graduated income, inheritance, and profits taxes, and against taxes on food and clothing, whose burden is actually shifted to the consumer."

In spite of this declaration, one of the first legislative enactments of the Roosevelt administration was the law under which over a billion dollars in processing taxes have been unconstitutionally imposed on bread, meats, cotton goods, and other necessities of life. Regardless of the merits or demerits of the A. A. A. program, it cannot be denied that these processing taxes bore most heavily upon those least able to bear them, and that they have resulted in an enormous increase in the cost of living while salaries and wages remained the same. Fortunately, the Supreme Court has now invalidated these iniquitous levies.

The administration also has continued for 3 years beyond their intended expiration date, the so-called nuisance taxes, which cost the taxpayers nearly $500,000,000 annually. Under the Social Security Act, two separate pay-roll taxes are imposed, the rates of which will eventually aggregate 9 percent on employers and employees and result in increasing the present tax burden by $2,700,000,000 annually. I call attention to the fact that none of these taxes are based upon the principle of ability to pay.

The suggestion has frequently been advanced by New Deal apologists that when the time comes to pay for the present spending program the burden will be thrust chiefly upon the well-to-do. However, the President discovered last year, when he secured the enactment of his share-the-wealth tax bill, that even by increasing taxes on the rich to the point of confiscation, the present revenues could only be increased by $250,000,000. This sum lacks exactly $3,325,000,000 of being sufficient to offset the deficit for the last fiscal year, and is only 3 percent of the estimated expenditures for the current year. It would pay the running expenses of the Government for less than 2 weeks.

The great masses of our citizens—those of moderate and meager circumstances—must, therefore, realize that it is upon them, and not alone upon the wealthy, that the New Deal must rely to pay for its reckless spending. Every man, woman, and child in the country, whether realizing it or not, has had a stake in the administration's orgy of extravagance and waste. All the time it has been going on it has been not alone the income and property of the wealthy that has been squandered but also the future earnings of the man on relief, the clerk in the store, the stenographer, the shopkeeper, the farmer, the factory worker, and others of small means, even including generations yet unborn.

Since we will all be taxed to pay for the New Deal's spending, it is up to each of us to ask ourselves whether we are satisfied with the way our money is being used and whether we consider we are getting value received for the taxes we will ultimately be compelled to pay. The fact that there are more than 10,000,000 still unemployed, that some 20,000,000 people have been forced to rely upon relief for an existence, and that the New Deal has had to abandon as worthless one grand spending scheme after another should furnish a ready answer.

What is the remedy for the condition in which we find ourselves today?

So far as the obligations which have already been incurred are concerned, there is no remedy. The cost of the New Deal's reckless spending must simply be charged up to experience. But there is a way to avoid still further taxation, or its alternative—ruinous inflation. The New Deal spendthrifts can be turned out of office and a sane and economical government restored. What we need is wise spending, not wasteful spending. This can be secured through the election of a Republican President and a Republican majority in Congress.

In the coming election the people will have an opportunity to choose between Roosevelt profligacy and Coolidge economy. They have had experience under both. I am confident that they have seen the error in placing the present Democratic administration in control of the Government, and that next November they will return to power the party which reduced the wartime public debt by $10,000,000,000 in 10 years, while at the same time making four separate reductions in the tax burden. I thank you.

THE FARM PROBLEM

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech I delivered by radio on October 17, 1935, over a national broadcasting hook-up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio on October 17, 1935:

In order to understand the problem which I have been asked to discuss this evening it is necessary to know something about the history of American agriculture and about the conditions which made the expansion of America's farm area possible. The first half of the nineteenth century saw the beginning of two significant and history-making movements, one of which took place in Europe and the other in the United States. First in England, and then on the Continent, the invention of the steam engine caused handicraft production to be superseded by power-driven machines. The result was the industrialization of western Europe and a movement of people from the farms to the factories.

Whenever a European acre was withdrawn from cultivation it became profitable to break and put into production another American acre. It was opportunity to produce food for a European population that had shifted its emphasis from agricultural to industrial production that made possible the development of the Middle West and the extension of America's agricultural frontier.

Without a large export market it would not have been possible for 30,000,000 people to engage in agriculture in this country, and without the restoration of a large export market it will never again be possible for 30,000,000 people to be engaged profitably in agriculture in the United States.

American agriculture was established on an export basis, and its prosperity can be restored only to the extent that it again becomes an export industry. Failure to understand that basic fact is responsible for the short-sighted and even suicidal agricultural policy of the Roosevelt administration.

I am not attacking the Agricultural Adjustment Act as such, for I grant that, however inadequate it may be and however bad some phases of its administration have been, it has done some good as an emergency measure. But I am attacking an administration that has stooped to the folly of regarding it, and the policy of acreage reduction which it embodies, as a permanent solution of the farm problem. That the President himself so regards it he stated in his recent speech at Fremont, Nebr., where he said, "I like to think of the Agricultural Adjustment Act not merely as a temporary means of rescue for a great industry but as the expression of an enduring principle."

It is to be an "enduring principle" that agriculture must forego foreign markets and limit its production to domestic needs. It is to be an "enduring principle" that the farmer shall be required, by means which may seem voluntary but are in fact coercive, to keep a substantial part of his acreage fallow, receiving as rent for his retired land a miserable pittance supplied by a processing tax. It is to be an "enduring principle" that farmers must obey orders from Washington telling what to raise and how much; that they must submit to inquisition by official snoopers and run the risk of heavy penalties if they evade bureaucratic regulations.

INTELLIGENCE UNDERESTIMATED

The President mistakes the temper and underestimates the intelligence of the farmers of America. They have accepted the agricultural adjustment program as a temporary expedient, but they will not accept it as a permanent policy. They realize, even if the President does not, that it is not a solution of the farm problem but, at best, a stopgap; that, as the very name implies, it is a means for meeting an emergency—a device to be used until measures of permanent adjustment have been put into effect. They know that the future of farming in this country calls for increased, not reduced, production; for the development of markets rather than restriction of output. They condemn the administration for pursuing a policy that has resulted in flooding this country with foodstuffs from abroad and for failing to take even a single step intelligently directed toward the reopening of closed export channels.

There has been another impediment to commerce which I haven't mentioned—the demoralization resulting from currency depreciation. When European nations, led by England, sought to remove that impediment by stabilizing currencies, the United States assumed the role of obstructionist. By abruptly withdrawing from the London Economic Conference President Roosevelt frustrated a plan wisely conceived to reopen the avenues of world trade and took a step that has definitely prolonged the depression.

There are certain opportunities for foreign trade which, if wisely exploited, would make it possible to develop elsewhere markets that would compensate for our losses in Europe. In other words, we are in a position to use our buying power as leverage for a profitable reciprocity. Has the administration so used it? On the contrary, it has thrown away our opportunity. When Cordell Hull negotiated a trade agreement with Haiti and agreed that her coffee should enter this country without duty, he placed Brazil, which had a treaty containing the "most favored nation" clause, in a position where she could claim the same privilege for her coffee without giving anything in return. The adoption of the Haitian trade agreement deprived the United States of the means with which to force trade concessions from Brazil.

We buy more rubber, sisal, silk, tea, and cacao than any other nation, and can wield a heavy leverage. Let the countries which produce these and other noncompetitive agricultural products find here a free and profitable market, but only on the condition that they take in exchange those of our agricultural commodities which they do not produce, and the American farmer will manage to get by without subsidies from his Government.

SUBSIDIZING A DEFICIENCY

To restore the balance in agriculture it is necessary not only to find foreign outlets for farm products but also to save the farmer from destructive competition in the home market. This the present administration has not even tried to do. On the contrary, it has resisted and obstructed every effort made to protect American agriculture against the rising tide of imports.

Last year Congress, in an effort to help the dairy farmer, placed an excise tax on coconut oil. The President not only tried to cajole Members of Congress from agricultural States into voting against the levy; he not only threatened to veto the bill in which it was incorporated; but, failing by obstructive tactics to defeat the tax the farmers demanded, he proceeded to secure from his subordinates an interpretation of the tax provision which evaded its plain meaning and partly nullified what Congress had tried to do.

Within 8 months 22,000,000 pounds of butter has come into this country from abroad. Not until imports had completely demoralized the butter market did the administration even make a gesture of disapproval. More loyal to the fetish of free trade than to the interests of the American farmer, the President stood by while the great dairy industry, the very bulwark of our agriculture, was being destroyed by bombardment from abroad.

Within the same 8 months 4,000,000 tons of foreign sugar was permitted to enter the United States. Instead of giving the domestic grower of beets and cane an even chance to compete in the home market—which was the very least a government could do for its own people—the administration and its instrument, a supine Congress, established quota restrictions limiting the amount of cane and beets the American farmer is permitted to produce for the American market.

Within the same 8 months 10,000,000 bushels of rye has entered the United States, most of it from Poland, which makes a practice of subsidizing exports. Time and again the President has refused to exercise his power to increase the duty on rye 50 percent. Twice the Treasury Department has declined to invoke the antidumping provisions of the tariff act. Instead of taking the obvious course of stopping imports, the administration last week announced the adoption of a 4-year program intended to reduce the domestic production of rye 25 percent. To finance the program there is to be imposed a processing tax of 30 cents a bushel. In other words, the American people are to be taxed in order to curtail the production of American rye, presumably in order to make room for more Polish rye in the American market.

During the first 7 months of this year more than 23,000,000 bushels of corn was brought into the United States from abroad. During the same period we imported 7,000,000 bushels of wheat, 10,000,000 bushels of oats, and 5,000,000 bushels of barley. We imported 28,000,000 pounds of beans, 122,000,000 pounds of cottonseed oil, and 176,000,000 pounds of tallow. Our imports of canned meats were 44,000,000 pounds, and of other meat products 67,000,000.

At a time when we were holding millions of acres of our own land out of cultivation we admitted from abroad the products of millions of acres of foreign soil.

THOSE 6,000,000 PIGS

Two years ago the administration killed 6,000,000 pigs in order to raise the price of pork. Last week Secretary Wallace, stampeded by protests from consumers, announced that he would seek a 30-percent increase in hog production next year in order to reduce the price of pork. He should have announced at the same time that experience has proved that it is impossible by "economic planning" to balance the supply and demand of farm products. Rains and winds, drought and rust, are unpredictable elements that confound the wisest among the smart young men who are now directing the Nation's destinies from Washington.

In order to avoid scarcity in lean years it is necessary to maintain an acreage large enough to yield a surplus in fat years. Therefore the only wise agricultural policy, the only "economic plan" that will work is: (1) To let the farmer operate on a surplus basis, as he always has done in the past; (2) to provide him with outside markets with sufficient elasticity to absorb the surplus, be the same great or small; and (3) to protect him in the home market against the competition of cheap lands and peasant labor.

Recently the country was shocked by the disclosure that in 3 years under Roosevelt there will be spent as much public money as was spent by all the Presidents from George Washington to Woodrow Wilson. That revelation should be of extraordinary interest to the farmer, for he, of all men, is most heavily burdened by taxation. The taxes on what he buys he cannot pass on, and the taxes on what he sells are charged back to him.

The unprecedented expenditures of the administration, which this year aggregate $10,250,000,000, will be reflected not only in burdensome taxes but in high interest rates. I assume that it has occurred to very few farmers, and in fact to very few bankers, that the financing of huge Government deficits is responsible in a large degree for the failure of interest rates on mortgages and other long-term obligations to follow prices and general incomes downward.

DEBT DEEPENING

The annual flotation of billions of dollars in Government bonds has given men of wealth—men in the higher income tax brackets—opportunity to invest all their funds in securities the income from which is tax-exempt. I want to say to you farmers that when the volume of Government securities offered is great enough to absorb all the new capital available for investment there is no inducement to buy farm mortgages.

There can be no substantial relief for the owner of a mortgaged farm, nor for any other person struggling with a heavy debt, until the Government either stops issuing additional bonds or begins to tax the interest income from its own securities.

The present administration, far from accomplishing recovery, is plunging the country deeper and deeper into debt. It is increasing expenditures and piling up deficits in a way to make its promises to balance the budget sound like childish chatter.

It has already brought us to the brink of a dangerous inflation. It is regimenting the people, scuttling their bill of rights, and sneering at what it calls their "horse and buggy" Constitution.

How much further the President intends to go in his self-appointed task of remaking America we cannot know. For those who believe that the American system is basically sound and who wish to chart the Nation's future within the American pattern the course of duty is clear. It is to elect in 1936 not only a President who is satisfied to be President but a Congress that will insist upon its prerogatives as such, refusing to be a rubber stamp, refusing to yield to the Executive the powers reserved to the representatives of the people.

THE NEW DEAL'S TARIFF AND EFFECT UPON FARMERS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing an address I made over the radio on October 16 last.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio on October 16, 1935:

The American people no longer are under the spell of New Deal hypnotism. For some little time past now they have been weighing the policies of President Roosevelt and their disastrous consequences. They have analyzed congressional action and have come to the conclusion that many of Mr. Roosevelt's experiments could not have been enacted into law had it not been for a completely servile New Deal majority in both Houses of Congress. They are rapidly coming to the conclusion that New Deal policies furnish the greatest inconsistencies in American history.

Our people already are aware of the scandalous waste and the extravagances of the Roosevelt administration. This record of the greatest-spendthrift administration in all history will be impressed still further upon them when, as is inevitable, they are called upon to foot the bill. Then, if they have not done so before, this land will resound with the cry "turn the spendthrifts out."

While there is hardly a single phase of Mr. Roosevelt's long record of violations of the trusts imposed upon him that does not lend itself to constructive criticism, I wish tonight particularly to speak about the tariff and its ruinous effect upon the American farmer. We in the East, especially in New England, have seen the dire consequences to industry. Despite this, and because of the A. A. A. Government checks to agriculturalists, our farmers have been temporarily lulled into the belief that the New Deal administration is helpful to them. Unfortunately, they have a day of awakening coming, and the New Deal tariff policy will have much to do with hastening that day.

Although we heard broadsides of criticism against the Smoot-Hawley tariff law in Congress, and the New Deal statesmen told us it was conceived in iniquity, there has been no open attempt by this administration to repeal it.

Mr. Roosevelt, in his 1932 campaign, indicated that there would be a change in our tariff schedules, that this would be effected by Presidential power through the regularly established United States Tariff Commission and its staff of experts, and only after long and due deliberations.

Little did we know that we were to be changed from a protective tariff into a free-trade nation by indirection. But indirection seems to be the order of the day. Congress, through its tremendous and subservient New Deal majority, was induced to turn over to the executive department its tariff-making powers so that our tariff rates would be made the football of foreign negotiations.

DETERMINED DESTRUCTION

Let me remind you that when it was decided to destroy the protective tariff through mining and sapping, the best engineer for the job was put in charge of the work. Mr. Cordell Hull, of Tennessee, an honest and sincere man, but a confirmed internationalist and a free trader, was named Secretary of State. It would seem that for tariff negotiation which would turn American markets over to alien producers, Mr. Hull is perhaps the best qualified man in America. For years as a statesman and stump speaker he has been asserting to all who would listen, that a protective tariff is immoral and indecent, that an American standard of living, higher than that in alien lands, established by tariff differentials, is a sham and a fraud. Mr. Hull remained firm in his faith, even though the world seemed to hold against him. As a tariff expert he belongs not to the horse and buggy days but to the era of the ox cart and the pillion.

There have been rumors abroad that there is disagreement in the ranks of the New Dealers, that some of them advocate American nationalism, while the calm Mr. Hull stands out for world-wide economic brotherly love. We are told that the export surplus theory of the Secretary of State mixes about as well with the burn the surplus theory of the A. A. A. as do shoes and ships and sealing wax, and cabbages and kings.

Although this may be true in practice—and it is true—it is by no means the case in theory. For we have it from his own words that Mr. Wallace himself, Secretary of Agriculture and kingpin of the A. A. A., is inherently an internationalist. He would sacrifice some of our industries and many of our workers if he could bring prosperity to others. That it may be impossible to destroy one organ of a national body without seriously injuring the entire system he ignores as a practical suggestion. But let me read in part what he says in his much exploited book, America Must Choose: "Traditionally the Democratic Party is the party of low tariffs. Actually Democratic administrations have never made changes in the tariff structure great enough to increase foreign purchasing power to the extent demanded by the present world dilemma. If we are going to increase foreign purchasing power enough to send abroad our normal surpluses of cotton, wheat, and tobacco at a decent price, we shall have to accept nearly a billion dollars' worth more goods from abroad than we did in 1929 * * * that will involve radical reduction in tariffs that might seriously hurt certain industries, and a few kinds of agricultural businesses, such as sugar-beet growing and flax growing. It might also cause pain for a while to wool growers and to farmers who supply material for various edible oils. I think we ought to face that fact. If we are going to lower tariffs radically there may have to be some definite planning whereby certain industries or businesses will have to be retired."

Passing for the moment the painful fact that some of Mr. Wallace's dire prophecies have already come true, it may be seen from this quotation that the Secretary is by no means a staunch nationalist. Theoretically he is willing to follow Mr. Hull.

Armed with his authority for tariff treaty making, Mr. Hull has gone busily forth striking at American tariff barriers at every opportunity. His great purpose is to welcome foreign goods, whether they be made by peasant worker or coolie. His announced effort is to find a market abroad for the surplus of American farmers.

NO EXPORTABLE SURPLUS

But, alas, Mr. Wallace and the A. A. A. have seen to it that there is no farm surplus to export. More than 6,000,000 pigs and hundreds of thousands of potential porcine mothers were slaughtered and consigned to the funeral pyre or dumped into middle western rivers to become tidbits for unappreciative catfish. Fields were plowed under, and we were propagandized into believing that the way to become wealthy was to destroy wealth. Ideals of thrift were laughed down as principles of the jungle days, which could not stand for a moment before the theorems of Professor Tugwell and the logarithms of Prof. Mordecai Ezekiel. Then Providence, flaunted by the New Deal, took a hand and man-made fire and slaughter was followed by drought and failure.

The professors had worked greater wonders than they knew. Not only was the surplus destroyed, but a deficit was created. We have sacrificed our home market in a vain effort to sell abroad a surplus when there is no surplus.

If the purpose of President Roosevelt and his administration was to destroy the protective tariff, and the acts of the free trader Mr. Hull under administration-sponsored legislation clearly indicate such a purpose, then the purpose is rapidly becoming realized. Mr. Hull has had powerful assistance. Retribution has come more quickly and in deadlier fashion than through the reciprocal tariff treaties, most of which are still in the making.

The artificial increase in the costs of American production by Government regimentation and regulation both in the factory and on the farm, plus the A. A. A. program of planned scarcity, have just about wiped out any protection which most American producers enjoyed before these hectic days of the New Deal. These higher American costs and planned scarcity have so helped the alien producer that he has been able to scale the American protective wall and undersell his American competitor in the American market.

Imports of food to the United States are showing a tremendous rise, with wheat, corn, and cattle in the lead. Wheat imports during the first half of 1935, according to the report of the United States Chamber of Commerce, have increased 117 percent, while imports of corn have grown 11,462 percent. Cattle imports have increased 356 percent, canned meat products 122 per cent, butter 7,446 percent, sugar 29 percent.

Lard and other pork products are being imported from Canada, while in the great packing centers of America the supply of hogs is the lowest in more than a half century. Thousands of men have been thrown out of work around the packing plants because there is nothing to do. Let us remember, too, that this is only the beginning. The shortage of home products and the importations from abroad will continue increasing in volume as Mr. Hull succeeds in bringing in more of his reciprocal treaties and as the shortage of our farm products becomes more acute.

ALIEN FARMER CHUCKLES

Money spent for agricultural products is now pouring from our consumers into Canada, Australia, and the Argentine. It is now the alien farmer who is chuckling up his sleeve. Taking advantage of the A. A. A. program of reducing production in America, he has increased his own production. This enabled him not only to take possession of the foreign market with his cheaper products, but to override the American tariff and capture a big portion of the richest market in the world—that of our own people.

Meantime Mr. Hull is not discouraged. He is going forward bravely, reducing American tariffs, inviting in foreign goods to take the place of the products of American workers, providing, as he so fondly thinks, a market for an American farm surplus which can now only be expressed in terms of algebra—as a minus quantity.

It would seem that nothing so becomes Mr. Hull as his courage. He is a crusader for imports, the "builder-upper" of the coolie worker and the peasant farmer. A fainter hearted internationalist might become discouraged by the results of the past 10 years. For example, he might believe that nations who fail to pay their debts might fail also in keeping tariff agreements. There are many examples of repudiation. Then there is the later case of Russia. Who does not remember how the Roosevelt administration welcomed Moscow to the family hearthstone when the versatile Mr. Litvinov promised us hundreds of millions in foreign trade and an entire cessation of Russian-inspired propaganda against the American Government? The increased foreign trade failed to materialize and the propaganda so increased in its intensity that the State Department, to save its face, felt impelled to send Moscow a protest which evoked an almost audible chuckle. One of those reciprocal trade agreements was entered into with Russia whereby Moscow agreed to buy $30,000,000 worth of goods a year in return for a freer American market. Yet in August Russia's purchase fell to $826,000 from $5,520,000 in July.

Another reciprocal agreement has been entered into with Cuba. Cuban exports to the United States, according to the Chemical Foundation, have increased $31,025,000 in 1935. Yet in turn Cuba has bought from us only $18,551,000 more. Once more Uncle Sam is on the little end. The rest of the balance has gone elsewhere. But one of Mr. Wallace's predictions will doubtless soon prove true. He told us that American beet-sugar growers would have to be sacrificed in the quest for foreign trade. With our greatly increased import of Cuban sugar this calamity is already coming true.

THE REMEDY

But, we may ask, is there no remedy? Yes; there is a remedy, but it is an old-fashioned one, a remedy as old as the Nation itself, a remedy which was applied in the first Congress of the United States and was hailed as our second Declaration of Independence. It is the remedy of tariff protection, properly and sensibly applied, based not on foreign agreements or diplomatic intrigue but on the broad conception of protection to American industry, in the factory, and on the farm. It was by applying such a principle that we grew to be potentially the richest nation on earth. It was with this guiding principle that the American market became the coveted objective of every nation which profits by cheap labor and a living standard ground down to the bare subsistence level—a market which normally absorbs more than 90 percent of all our products, providing ample prosperity for the American worker and the American farmer.

WAR DEPARTMENT AIRCRAFT PROCUREMENT

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] have permission to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the manner of purchasing aircraft by the Army, together with a letter from the Secretary of War attached.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, the investigation carried on by the Committee on Military Affairs into War Department business transactions during the Seventy-third Congress and also during the Seventy-fourth Congress up to date has been of very great benefit to the Army and to the cause of national defense and therefore to the country. Among the many matters brought under investigation was that of the manner of buying airplanes for the use of the Army. It was discovered that the spirit, purpose, and provisions of the act of July 2, 1926, were being ignored and disregarded in a large measure. Instead of holding frequent design competitions and instead of buying aircraft in quantity only after due advertisement and open competitive bidding, in accordance with the law as frequently expounded by the Judge Advocate General of the Army and later by the Attorney General of the United States, aircraft was purchased by private negotiation.

After this situation was called to the attention of the Secretary of War and of The Assistant Secretary of War, they became convinced not only of the true interpretation of the law but that the purpose and intent of the law was wise, and would protect the Government from a financial point of view, and at the same time insure progress and rapid development in the designing and construction of military aircraft.

It is a source of great gratification to the Committee on Military Affairs to learn that the War Department, in the administration of the procurement law with reference to aircraft, after the same originated in this committee and was finally enacted into law on July 2, 1926, is meeting with so much success. This success is justification for the confidence that the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives had in the advantages of competition after public advertisement and full and free opportunity for all manufacturers and designers to present their products to the War Department. Undoubtedly competition is not only the life of trade, but it is the life of progress in all lines. The evolution of aircraft is the history of generous and aggressive rivalry between individual designers and groups of designers, and between individual manufacturers and groups of manufacturers.

Many friends of progress in aviation have asserted that only certain individuals could design certain types of military aircraft, and only certain manufacturers could succeed in manufacturing certain types of military aircraft, but this has been shown to be unsound. It would be a sad day for the cause of national defense if only one person could succeed in designing a particular kind of aircraft, and if only one manufacturer could manufacture and sell only a particular kind of airplane. Upon the death of such person and upon the failure for any reason of such manufacturer, the national defense would be left in the lurch.

The experience of the War Department since a wholehearted and sincere effort has been made to apply the principle of advertisement and open competitive bidding is gratifying. The kind of craft being produced as a result of this policy is a great advance over previous types. Undoubtedly the continuation of the present policy will result in continued progress, and the ultimate result will be, just as the sponsors of the act of July 2, 1926, have always claimed, that America will keep in the forefront of all the other nations in the matter of aircraft. Undoubtedly American engineers have the skill and American inventors have the genius and American manufacturers have the material, the tools, and the skilled laborers to turn out the very best fighting craft in all the world. When the present policy shall have prevailed for a few years longer we will see the full fruition of what now promises to be a great forward movement for the cause of national defense.

I herewith offer for printing in connection with these remarks two letters from the Secretary of War giving a report as to progress being made in the matter of purchasing aircraft.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 13, 1936.

Hon. JOHN J. McSWAIN,
Chairman, Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. McSWAIN: Aware of the keen and continued interest of yourself and your committee in the matter of procurement of aircraft for the Army Air Corps, I wish to take this opportunity of further elaborating upon my letter of August 15, 1935, to you and of presenting such additional significant facts as have occurred since that time. You will recall that the War Department has consistently maintained that the present policy of procurement by competitive bidding, which policy I interpret as the underlying purpose and principle of the act of July 2, 1926, would have to be in operation at least 2 years before a final conclusion could be reached as to its efficacy. With approximately 18 months behind us and with the accomplishment of certain results, which are set forth below, I feel all the more certain that the procurement policy as now operated will more than justify the enthusiasm which has been had for it by its sponsors.

Since the present policy was put into effect the War Department has contracted for and now has on order a total of 685 airplanes. The first contract of this group was let on June 28, 1934, and to date 10 airplanes have been delivered thereunder. In addition, the first airplane under each of several of the other contracts has been delivered and accepted. Inasmuch as this delivery may at first glance seem small, I wish to emphasize here that the major problems creating delay in the delivery of aircraft arise in connection with the test and acceptance of the first airplane under the contract and that thereafter the delivery of the remaining planes is accomplished at a very much accelerated rate. This is significantly borne out by the fact that deliveries of aircraft under the afore-mentioned contracts will total more than 500 during the year 1936, commencing at the rate of approximately 20 for the month of January and increasing progressively each month thereafter.

I am going into the matter of the time factor in some detail because one of the chief criticisms against the War Department has been the length of time between the inception of an airplane design and the delivery of airplanes of this design in quantity to the tactical units in the field. Since the present procedure has been put into effect, constant efforts have been made to reduce this elapsed period. One step taken is to issue circular proposals to the trade sufficiently far in advance of the availability of funds to permit the awarding of contracts almost immediately after appropriated funds become available to the Department. For example, circular proposals have already been issued to the trade covering 1937 requirements. Another step taken is the submitting of the airplane of the successful bidder to an "accelerated service test" for a period of 90 days, which procedure will reduce to a minimum the necessity of change orders with the delays incident thereto. I am pleased to be able to inform you that under the new policy of competitive bidding and the subsequent improvements which have been made therein, quantity deliveries of aircraft are now being made for tactical use within something less than 2 years of the date of advertising. For example, the circular proposal for attack airplanes was issued on May 28, 1934, and delivery of 6 airplanes has already been made, with delivery of approximately 40 more due by May 1936. Such a rate of delivery compares most favorably with that of foreign powers on which such information is available.

Another objection which the opponents of the present procurement policy offered against its adoption was the fear that procurement by competition would lessen the sources of supply, whereas the War Department contended that the opposite results would be obtained. I commented upon this matter, and the favorable results which had been obtained, in my letter of August 15, 1935. I wish to inform you that the results of the bidding during this past fall substantiate the contention that sources of supply will increase rather than decrease as a result of the opportunity offered to all bona fide manufacturers to compete for the War Department business. Furthermore, I feel that the stimulation of a creative interest in engineering and development places industry in a better position to meet the needs of the Army Air Corps in case an emergency should arise.

I wish to further reassure you with regard to the performance of the aircraft which are now being procured. Improvements in performances are extremely gratifying and in some instances far beyond even those hoped for. As an example, I think I can assure you that the very near future will see the single-seat pursuit airplane with a top speed of over 300 miles per hour, with proportionate improvements in the other types of airplanes with which the Army Air Corps is equipped.

Another matter in which you and your committee are particularly interested is that of design competition. I alluded to this in my letter of August 15, 1935, but at that time I had no definite information to furnish you. I now wish to advise that in two instances the design submitted was sufficiently advanced to warrant an award and a contract with the winners, and as a result the Wedell-Williams Air Service Corporation, Patterson, La., is manufacturing a single-place pursuit airplane, and the North American Aviation, Inc., Baltimore, Md., is manufacturing a three-place observation plane for the Army Air Corps. The War Department expects to continue the holding of periodic design competitions and has hopes that they will not only result in advances in design and engineering but will serve to produce additional sources of supply for military airplanes in the future.

Sincerely yours,

GEO. H. DERN, Secretary of War.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, August 15, 1935.

Hon. J. J. MCSWAIN,
Chairman, Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. MCSWAIN: At the time of the adoption of the present War Department policy for the procurement of aircraft The Assistant Secretary of War took the position that the policy would have to be in operation at least 2 years before sufficiently definite results could be obtained to render final judgment upon its efficacy. Although this policy has been in effect only 1 year, I feel that sufficient progress has been made to warrant a report to your committee at this time, and I am therefore setting forth below the results obtained to date, and my opinion of what may reasonably be expected in the future.

Briefly the policy calls for the placing of contracts for quantity procurement of airplanes as a result of competitive bids submitted by the industry. Advertisements submitted to the trade are on a performance-specification basis and require each competing manufacturer to submit with his bid a sample airplane complete and ready to fly. A period of from 8 to 12 months is allowed between the issuance of the advertisements and the opening of the bids to give the manufacturers adequate time in which to design, construct, and submit the sample airplanes for test. Award is made on the basis of a predetermined method of evaluation of which the bidders are made cognizant in the advertisement. This evaluation places a premium upon improvement in performance and award thereunder is made to the highest evaluated airplane, thereby assuring the Government obtaining the finest available aircraft. The advertisement further contains certain minimum performance requirements which are based upon the maximum performance of the finest known airplane at the time of issuance of the particular advertisement, and provides that no consideration will be given to any airplane that does not at least come up to these requirements.

This policy gives full rein to the inventive genius and engineering ability of the manufacturer and permits the incorporation in the sample to be submitted of all worth-while developments practically up to the actual date of opening. For example, a certain manufacturer arrived at Dayton, Ohio, with the airplane which he proposes to submit on a particular proposal about a month prior to the date of opening of bids. After arrival at Dayton he apparently decided that the plane could be additionally improved, and consequently has had a crew working upon it consistently since its arrival. If advertising had been based upon detailed specifications and drawings, with no incentive for turning out the finest possible type of airplane, it is fair to assume that proposals would have been received offering airplanes meeting only these detailed specifications and drawings, and not including therein the engineering developments which have taken place since their issuance many months before.

The making of awards under this system on the basis of a tested article, rather than on a "paper promise to perform", has an additional marked advantage. It enables the War Department to make contracts for quantity procurement with the knowledge that the manufacturer has actually demonstrated his ability to construct the finest available type of airplane, thereby eliminating the service test of an article, which would be necessary if samples were not required. This factor alone reduces by at least a year the elapsed time between the inception of a design and delivery of airplanes in quantity to troops in the field and eliminates to a great extent past criticism to the effect that airplanes are becoming obsolescent by the time they reach the hands of tactical organizations.

The War Department is gratified at the response of the industry to the new procurement policy. On standard equipment competition has been keen and has resulted in a great deal of engineering work on the part of manufacturers. It is fair to say that progress in the art has been materially advanced, moving ahead according to the belief of some people intimately connected with the industry as much as 3 to 5 years. Furthermore, manufacturers are offering airplanes whose performance exceeds expectations. For instance a basic training airplane now in service has a top speed of about 125 miles per hour while the basic trainers contracted for under the present system have a top speed of over 200 miles per hour. It appears reasonable to assume that no such advance would have been made at one stroke without the incentive of competition and the assurance that award would be made to the manufacturer offering the most advanced airplane.

When the present policy was originally adopted it was felt in some quarters that it would result in reducing the available sources of supply for the different types of airplanes. It was the opinion of the War Department that a competitive policy of procurement would give the opposite results and I am gratified to be able to state that such is apparently the case. For example, six manufacturers offered basic training airplanes in the last competition while four manufacturers entered observation airplanes. I am informed that three manufacturers will offer bombardment airplanes in that competition, bids on which are to be opened the 22d of this month. Reliable press reports indicate that each of these three companies has built and has ready for test a bombardment airplane which will far exceed the performance of any bombardment plane now known, with speeds ranging over 200 miles per hour, cruising range exceeding 3,000 miles and with greater useful loads than have heretofore been thought possible. Press reports further indicate that the Glenn L. Martin Co., which is now manufacturing a quantity of bombers for the Army, is offering a newly designed airplane in the competition under discussion. It is fair to assume that had procurement continued along the lines previously followed this company probably would have offered for this year's consideration the present type of Martin bomber with certain refinements and improvements rather than an airplane of completely new design and development.

In addition to quantity procurement competitions, the War Department is holding design competitions on many types of aircraft. These competitions were opened May 6, 1935, and resulted in 17 manufacturers entering the competition for pursuit airplanes and an average of 8 manufacturers in each of the other competitions. The necessity of giving preference to the work involving contracts for quantity procurement because of present shortage of airplanes in the Army and the amount of detail work necessary to evaluate the design competition have precluded any final determinations to date. It is expected to announce the winners of the design competitions at an early date, and it is hoped that the designs submitted will be sufficiently advanced to warrant the manufacture of experimental airplanes in accordance therewith.

I regret that the present procurement policy has not been in effect sufficiently long to enable me to furnish your committee more concrete information, but I feel certain that the progress and development outlined above are sufficient to enable you to conclude with me that the success of this policy is most promising and that nothing should be placed in the way of continuing the present method for a sufficient period to determine definitely its net worth.

Sincerely yours,

GEO. H. DERN, Secretary of War.

OUR OWN WILL ROGERS

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address delivered by me recently.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my tribute to our own Will Rogers, delivered through the facilities of the National Broadcasting Co. before the Oklahoma State Society November 14, 1935, as follows:

Friends, Oklahomans, Americans, paraphrasing Mark Antony, I come not to bury Will Rogers but to eulogize him.

If I were an artist, I might paint a picture too beautiful for the eye of man to behold. If I were an architect, I might plan an edifice too magnificent for human hands to construct. If I were a musician, I might compose a hymn that only angels could sing; but God alone could create a character equal to that of Will Rogers, Oklahoma's most beloved son, America's most noble citizen, and the world's greatest humanitarian friend since the Master of all Good Works sent His Son to earth to minister to mortals.

Men may joke and jest. Women may laugh and cry. Will Rogers undoubtedly was the only man of contemporary time who could truthfully utter the philosophy, "I never met a man I didn't like." His life was a mold of that practical wisdom. His very deeds manifest the logic of this association of his personality with this human viewpoint, "I never met a man I didn't like." No one but Will Rogers could have made this statement. The world could not in becoming manner express the same sentiment of any other character. Doubtless there is no living mortal who could not with utmost sincerity bear witness that "he never met a man who didn't like Will Rogers."

He endeared himself universally because he was everybody's friend. His homespun philosophy, fun-loving nature, and adventuresome cowboy spirit glorified Oklahoma and typified America. Will Rogers never joked about a man who was down. He always directed his shafts of humor at those who were riding the crest of public favor. He was severest critic and warmest friend at one and the same time. He could thrust a ripping barb at men holding high positions of state for the afternoon newspapers, but when the same papers brought him news of that man's personal or public difficulty he would fly across the continent and offer counsel at the next morning's breakfast table. Will Rogers would give his entire earnings to the Red Cross, crippled children, and other charities and borrow necessary expense money from his banker. Many Oklahoma children who are healthy and strong today are indebted to Will Rogers, who tore up a check or diverted his fee to some babies' milk fund. He did this in Oklahoma; he did it in every other State. Many men of the East, the West, the North, and the South, ranchers, ex-cowboys, artists, actors, newspapermen, have been given a new start and a new courage because the friendly hand of Will Rogers pressed a huge roll of paper money into their pockets.

Will Rogers presented the world a new type of humor. The news of the day was his workshop. He fashioned truth, wisdom, and philosophy with humor, criticism, and repair.

If I live for a century I could have no more profound hope, I could wish for no better demise than to come to the end of time and utter the philosophy expressed by the poet and lived by the man whose name I bear, our own Will Rogers, the most beloved son of Oklahoma, the most outstanding super-American, the most beautiful character to tread the globe since Christ came to earth and dwelt among men. Let my life be as his was, so that I can say, when my summons comes to join that innumerable caravan that leads to that mysterious realm from whose bourne no traveler returns, I approach my grave not like the quarry slave at night, scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed by an unfaltering trust I can wrap the draperies of my couch about me and lie down to pleasant dreams. Long may the memory of Will Rogers live in the hearts and minds of men.

JACKSON DAY ADDRESS

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address delivered by me recently.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me before the Intercollegiate Democratic League of New York on Wednesday, January 8, 1936:

Mr. President, members of the Intercollegiate Democratic League, ladies and gentlemen of the radio world, I want to thank you for this opportunity to speak to you. The Intercollegiate Democratic League has my profound gratitude and my best wishes for a successful year's work. I want to commend both your organization and the intercollegiate organization of America, with which you are affiliated and which has branches in 38 States, with a membership of more than a fourth of a million, for the fine work you are doing. You are building character, improving citizenship, and training the youth of today for leadership for tomorrow. I am sure you have the interest of all those seeking better government.

The history of the world commits itself to a distinct, self-evident tradition that in times of great national emergency there has invariably arisen a forthright leader able to command the loyal obeisance of his countrymen by the sheer genius of his personality and the profoundness of his program. Since the birth of our Nation, tracing our progress by the landmarks of critical emergencies overcome, we can pause and reflect in the security that America has, without fail, been equal to the exigency of every occasion. Whether it has been righteous reform or crucial revolution there has always emerged some American who by masterful precision, patriotic compassion, and keenness of intellect has wrested calm out of chaos and order out of confusion. Whether it has been "taxation without representation", "imperialistic infringement" of other nations, "secession from the Union", "autocracy or democracy", or war against economic bondage, as now engages our attention, America has steadfastly been able to produce on every occasion "the man of the hour."

If I were called upon to list the greatest men our country has produced, I would want to include the names of George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Abraham Lincoln, Woodrow Wilson, and Franklin D. Roosevelt. I come to you this evening to speak of only two of these outstanding American citizens, Andrew Jackson and Franklin D. Roosevelt. Jackson, though the son of penniless Irish immigrants, exemplified the true American citizen in his every work and deed. He was born on the frontier 2 years after his parents landed in North Carolina. As a soldier, "Old Hickory" saved a vast territory for his country. This implacable champion of the dignity of America and preserver of the Union was a soldier, Congressman, Senator, judge, and President of the United States. This hero of the Battle of New Orleans never turned his back on a friend nor his face from a foe. He knew not the meaning of fear. He was stern and unyielding in his determination to serve the American people and to maintain the dignity of the United States. He was the idol of the common people because he was one of them. No man can read the story of Andrew Jackson and not be a better citizen. No man can emulate his life without becoming a better American. On one occasion Jackson wrote: "The first duty of a soldier or good citizen is to attend to the safety and interest of his country. The next to attend to his own affairs wherever they are rudely or wantonly assailed."

Jackson was at all times ready to defend his country. You will remember his toast when he said, "Our Federal Union, it must be preserved." Andrew Jackson was a patriot and he loved his country, as evidenced by the following lines from one of his letters: "I know the writer to be a patriot, and possessing virtue such as every citizen ought to possess, who the God of nature has intended to live in a land of freedom and to enjoy the blessings of a Government like ours, and which alone can perpetuate to the Nation of America its freedom and independence." Jackson was proud of his birth as an American citizen. On March 7, 1812, he said: "We are the free-born sons of America; the citizens of the only Republic now existing in the world; and the only people on earth who possess rights, liberties, and property which they dare call their own." Old Hickory believed in a government of the people, by the people, and for the people. He wrote the following lines to his Cabinet on September 18, 1833: "The conduct of an American administration may not only be subjected to the control of its own citizens, entrusted as a corporate body with the management of its finances, but through them to the influence of the foreign capitalists with whom they may have identified their interests."

If the spirit of Andrew Jackson had not prevailed, we could not today revel in the satisfaction that in America personal freedom is enjoyed in a measure not comparable to that in any other nation; that free speech and freedom of the press are prerogatives unquestioned; that the right to orderly redress the Government for its shortcomings is guaranteed by the Constitution; that trial by jury is irrevocable; that religious worship is dictated by individual volition; that wise conservatism embodies a watchful readiness to modify, and even to replace, outmoded institutions and practices; and that intelligent liberalism incorporates a cooperative spirit in keeping with national perspective.

The work of Andrew Jackson in leading the people of America boldly forward along an unfamiliar road sets precedent for today's actions of President Roosevelt. Americans of today may ask "Are we not departing from the wisdom of the founders of this Republic? Are we not forgetting and ignoring the philosophy of Andrew Jackson?" If we are to interpret the deeds and spirit of Jackson correctly, we must conclude that his example is pointing the way for Roosevelt. The only contrast between the two lies in past and present machinery. As Roosevelt accelerates the facilities of the Government of the United States in its present form, meeting with precision the emergencies of the moment, so did Jackson apply the whip and spur to the new Government to speed forward the strengthening of the Union. Jackson and his colleagues were the boldest of experimenters. He opposed the powerful and long-established imperial governments of Europe. He waged a successful campaign entailing war and bloodshed. He was foremost in overthrowing the old order of things. He burdened his shoulders with the exacting and difficult duties of formulating a new principle of government, and he assumed the responsibility of launching forth a campaign for its acceptance by the people.

Jackson's age was an economic order of localism. His every act was devoted steadfastly to a program of economic and political betterment. When it became apparent to him that the old system was inadequate to the needs of a changing world he dared to experiment with new and untried systems. He strengthened the new cooperative democracy, destined to world leadership.

It is not idle illusion or presumptive fantasy to compare the present with the past. The Nation 3 years ago was caught in a maelstrom of devitalizing confusion and prejudice, with the forces of construction vesting their welfare in the sympathetic and responsive personality of Roosevelt. The President has launched forth in a manner comparable to Jackson, to check and overthrow a political imperialism and a capitalistic oligarchy. Like Jackson, he has promulgated ideas and changes that are revolutionary. The spirit of each was conceived in an ever-watchful and an ever-responsive attitude to safeguard American welfare.

America, with Franklin D. Roosevelt in the White House, entered upon a new path of national destiny. From the proclamation ordering the bank holiday to the personal message by the President to the heads of 54 nations, Mr. Roosevelt advanced from a vigorous and compelling national leader to a wise and humane world leadership. Behind this phenomenon lies a series of facts—issues, events, personalities—upon which the fate of a man and the destiny of a nation rests. The circumstance of Mr. Roosevelt's nomination and election is too profoundly a part of America's present survival and future progress to be left loosely spread over the incoherent reportings of the daily press and ephemeral reflections of periodical comment. Even today we cannot see clearly whither events are leading nor how far we may be carried before equilibrium is reached and this sliding civilization of ours shall once more come to rest.

Of one thing we are sure, that the great man in the White House today is bending his every effort for the betterment of his country, and we know we are safe in his hands. Franklin D. Roosevelt is a great President, but he is a greater American citizen. In 1932 he said: "It is time for redoubled, yes, heroic, measures to save, not only for the immediate future but for generations to come, the human values of our citizenship." Of all our eminent Presidents, not one has been more interested in the youth of the land than the present incumbent. On his fifty-second birthday he said: "Modern medical science has advanced so far that a very large proportion of children who for one reason or another have become crippled can be restored to useful citizenship." President Roosevelt is a real scout, and he believes in organizations for character education and citizen training. On February 8, 1935, he said, "The value of the Boy Scout organization in building character and in training for citizenship has made itself a vital factor in the life of America." Later in the same address he said, "The Boy Scout oath is the basis of good citizenship." On August of the same year we find him saying, "You boys, old and young, in every part of this broad land—present Scouts and former Scouts, your numbers running into the millions—constitute a very real part of our American citizenship. Even before you become of voting age you actually have a part in civic affairs and you bear responsibilities in your home communities. We older citizens are very proud of the many contributions that individual Scouts and Scout organizations have made to * * * the furtherance of good citizenship and good government. * * * Just as you are individually a necessary part of your patrol or your troop today, so will you become necessary parts of the citizenship of your communities."

No President has ever been more considerate or more thoughtful of the women of this great Republic. Quoting from Mr. Roosevelt's statement in October 1935, we find: "The women of America, as their responsibilities of citizenship have greatly expanded, are turning with intense earnestness to measures which are aimed at eliminating or alleviating the effects of these imperfections of our society. * * * My task and the task of all those others who are associated with me in the official life of the country can be made easier if the citizenship of the Nation, and particularly the women citizens of the Nation, seek the truth and a wise application of the truth." What better tribute could be paid to the wives and mothers of the sons of this great Republic? Our country has not produced a more affable, courteous, friendly leader than Franklin D. Roosevelt. His broad smile, his kind words, and his winsome ways have given him a place in the heart of every American citizen approached by no man of his day or of past generations; yet with all this, he is a "two fisted" fighter, as has been evidenced many times during the past few years. You will remember his aggressive, forceful address "on the state of the Union" delivered to the Congress only a few days ago. President Roosevelt is a peace-loving man, but he does not believe in "peace at any price." Andrew Jackson in all his glory showed no more aggressive, forceful spirit than did President Roosevelt when he delivered the above-mentioned message. Some 3 years ago Roosevelt said, "I believe in the fundamental obligation of citizenship to don the uniform of our country, to carry arms in its defense when our country and the things it stands for are attacked."

No man can succeed without the help of his coworkers. As a true American citizen, President Roosevelt realized this and he has been quick to acknowledge this fact. In 1935 he said: "I have reason to remember the past 2½ years that have gone by so quickly, reason to remember the fine spirit of the average of American citizenship which made my task lighter."

Andrew Jackson has left his imprint upon American civilization. President Roosevelt is now making his. Let us all continue to cooperate in the hope that we may make his burdens lighter.

Members of the Intercollegiate Democratic League, I commend to you two of our country's most eminent sons, Andrew Jackson, second to one, and Franklin D. Roosevelt, second to none.
